

E 13797

the popular chamber, and such were certainly not anxious to bill the effect of which might lead them to have recourse to the means from which they had just escaped heavy debts and diminished credit of their bankers'. Still the government, the question which had been postponed, then deferred, and finally altogether, could no longer be postponed and must resolutely be taken in opposition was to be expected. It was hoped that the Liberal Government would be strong enough to defeat the Conservative, and eventually enrol themselves upon the statute-book. On the 12th (March 12, 1866) Mr. Gladstone's House crowded in every part, and leave to bring in a bill for the representation of the people. The compromise between the extreme and the more conservative projects of the Liberal party, and like most compromises to satisfy either section. It was intended and moderate for the Liberals, but too destructive for the Liberals as proposed by Mr. Lowe and Mr. Horsman. In the course of his speech Mr. Gladstone summed up the provisions of the bill which the government proposed to introduce. "The first is," he said, "to give the occupation franchise in counties, and in towns, or houses with land, and in houses with a rental of £14, and reaching up to the £50 occupation franchise of £50. The second is, to introduce into counties and in towns that copyholders and leaseholders in parliamentary boroughs shall stand upon the same footing as freeholders in boroughs now stand upon the same footing of county voting, without distinction in the relative amounts of the franchise for household and copyholders and with freehold. The third is a new franchise, which will operate in towns and towns, but which may be made the more sensible operation in towns. In towns we propose, to give compound householders on the same footing as ratepaying householders. We propose to abolish tax and rate paying clauses; we propose to reduce the £10 clear annual value to a £7 clear annual value; and to bring in the gross estimated rental taken from the rate-book as the measure of the value, thus, pro tanto, making the rate-book the register. We propose, also, to introduce a franchise on behalf of lodgers, which will comprehend both those persons holding part of a house with separate and independent access, and those who hold part of a house as inmates of the family of another person. The qualification for the suffrage in these classes will be the £10 clear annual value of apartments, without reference to furniture."

In the debate that ensued, which extended over several nights, all the parliamentary ability of the House was enlisted. It was on this occasion that Mr. Lowe, not unmindful of the manner in which the Liberals had behaved to him when under the harrow of Lord Robert Cecil, opposed the reform bill of the government in a series of speeches which for close reasoning, brilliant diction, and mordant invective are among the finest specimens of oratory of this century. Witty and eloquent as were the speeches of Mr. Disraeli, it must be confessed that during the reform debate it was Mr. Lowe who was the most brilliant and the most formidable antagonist of the government. What Mr. Disraeli was in 1845 to the cause of free trade, so Mr. Lowe was in 1866 to the cause of reform. In all his attacks upon the bill, and in all his strictures against the venality and ignorance of the working classes,* Mr. Lowe was warmly

* "You have had the opportunity of knowing some of the constituencies of this country, and I ask, if you want venality, ignorance, drunkenness, and the means of intimidation—if you want impulsive, unreflecting, and violent people, where will you go to look for them—to the top or to the bottom? It is ridiculous to blink the fact that, since the Reform Act, great competition has prevailed amongst the voters of between £20 and £10 rental—the £10 lodging and beerhouse keepers. . . . We know what sort of persons live in these small houses; we know all had experience of them under the name of 'freemen,' and it would be a good thing if they were disfranchised altogether."—Mr. Lowe, March 12, 1866.

THE LIFE OF LORD HILL.

796
Biography

Your very affly
W.H.

THE LIFE
OF
LORD HILL, G.C.B.

COMMANDER OF THE FORCES.

THE REV. EDWIN SIDNEY, A.M.

AUTHOR OF THE LIVES OF THE DUKES OF BOWLAND HILL AND SIR RICHARD HILL, AND CHAPLAIN TO THE VINDICATED HILL.

Lord Hill's Column at Shrewsbury

LONDON:
JOHN MURRAY, ALBEMARLE STREET.

1845.

THE QUEEN'S MOST EXCELLENT MAJESTY,

BY HER MAJESTY'S GRACIOUS PERMISSION,

AND

WITH A VIVID SENSE OF THE HONOUR CONFERRED ON

THE MEMORY OF

THE LATE LORD HILL,

BY SUCH A DISTINGUISHED MARK OF HER MAJESTY'S ESTIMATION

OF HIS LORDSHIP'S SERVICES

This Narrative of his Life

1

MOST HUMBLY DEDICATED.

BY HER MAJESTY'S DEVOTED SUBJECT AND SERVANT,

THE AUTHOR

PREFACE.

THE papers of the late Lord Hill having been confided to my discretion with a view of presenting the public with the narrative of his life, I have endeavoured to produce a faithful delineation of his rare and estimable character. I have reason to believe that my being selected as his biographer is, in a great measure, due to the friendly approbation expressed by his Lordship himself, and his nearest relatives, of the manner in which I had discharged a similar duty with regard to his two uncles, the Reverend Rowland Hill and Sir Richard Hill. Thus encouraged, I ventured on the task proposed to me, and with the more readiness, because the history of the military achievements of Lord Hill has been already written in the Despatches of the Duke of Wellington and the official accounts of the battles in which he was engaged. My endeavour in the present volume has been to compile, from the materials preserved by himself and supplied by his friends, an authentic detail of his whole life, and to make himself the principal narrator of his own interesting career. Enough of his correspondence and memoranda have been preserved for this purpose, the chief attraction of which will be found in that simplicity of style whereby his accounts of the transactions in which he engaged are rendered intelligible to every class of readers.

I trust I have sufficiently acknowledged in the progress of the work the assistance I have derived, and the communications I have received, from the friends and admirers of Lord Hill. Not a single application made to any of them, of whatever station, that did not receive the most kind and favourable attention.

I have now only to hope for the indulgence of the public, and trust it will be found that I have not, in the discharge of my office as a biographer, forgotten the higher and more solemn one of a minister of the Gospel.

EDWIN SIDNEY.

Acle, near Norwich,
March 19 1845.

CONTENTS.

CHAPTER I.

Characteristics of the Hill Family. — The First Sir Rowland Hill. — His Namesake Lord Hill. — His Parentage and Birth. — His Brothers and Sisters. — Compliment of George IV. — Mr. John Hill. — Lord Hill's Memoranda of his early Life. — His Conduct at School. — His Modesty and delicate Health. — His Sensibility. — Anecdotes. — Chooses the Army. — His own Account. — Obtains ■ Ensigncy in the 38th Regiment. — Goes to ■ Military Academy at Strasburg. — Lieutenant in the 53rd. — Returns to Strasburg. — Tour. — The Bottle of Champagne. — Scotland. — Popularity in his Regiment. — Made Captain. — Ireland. — Irish Toilet and Wedding. — Toulon. — Prediction of General O'Hara. — Action at Toulon. — Narrow Escape. — Lord Mulgrave and Captain Hill. — Wounded — Takes Home Despatches. — Major in the 90th. — Mr. Graham — Lieutenant-Colonel of the 90th. — Robespierre and O'Hara. — Event of the Day — Stadtholder at Hawkstone. — Ish Dicu. — Gibraltar — General O'Hara — Sir Ralph Abercromby. — Plans, and their Alteration. — Remarks . . . . . Page 1

CHAPTER II.

Change in Colonel Hill's Plans. — His Pocket Journal. — General Whitelock. — Voyage. — Gibraltar. — General O'Hara. — The Pegasus. — Curious Dinner. — Indisposition of Colonel Hill. — The "Diversion." — Malta. — Proceeds to Egypt. — Lord Keith. — The Landing. — Battle of the ■ of March. — Colonel Hill wounded: saved by his Helmet. — Taken on board the Foudroyant. — Battle of the 21st. Mortal Wound of Sir R. Abercromby: he is carried to the ■ Cabin with Colonel Hill. — His Death. — Capitau Pacha. — Presents. — The brave 90th. —

Campaign continued. — Colonel Hill's Notes. — The Grand Visir in the British Camp. — Evacuation of Egypt by the French — General Hope — Congratulations. — Joseph Wilmoughly — Conduct of the 90th. — The Wet Carpenter. — Death and Character of General O'Hara. — Results of the Egyptian Campaign . . . . . Page 31

CHAPTER III.

Colonel Hill arrives in England, April 1. 1802. — Fête Hawkstone. — Letter to Mr. Winfield. — Increase of the 90th. — Ireland. — Colonel Hill made Brigadier-General. — Leaves the 90th. — His Proceedings in Ireland — Alarms. — Empty Casks. — The Galway Volunteers. — Precautions against the expected Invasion. — Disaffection, and consequent Measures. — Signals. — More Alarms about the French. — Activity on this Account. — Arrears. — Lord Cathcart's Communication. — Rumours, and their Contradictions. — Vexatious Obstacles. — Disputes. — Another Look-out for the French Fleet. — Impartial Character of General Hill. — He leaves Galway. — Amicable Society. — Verification of a Remark of the Earl of Buchan . . . . . 51

CHAPTER IV.

Preparations for the Continent. — Letters of the Duke of York and Lord Cathcart. — Expedition to the Weser. — Christmas-day, 1805. — General Hill's first Interview with Sir Arthur Wellesley. — The Return from the Weser. — Pilot's News off Yarmouth. — Death of General Hill's Mother. — Encampment on Shorn Cliff. — Made Major-General. — Ireland again. — Remains there till ordered in 1806 to join Sir Arthur Wellesley. — First Peninsular Campaign. — Preparations. — Correspondence — Departure. — Voyage. — Landing in Mondego Bay. — New Arrangements. — Noble Bearing of Sir Arthur Wellesley. — His Instructions for the first Movements of the Troops on the Continent. — Battle of Roliça. — Battle of Vimeiro. — Convention. — Sir John Moore. — Campaign. — Battle of Coruña. — General Hill brings home Troops to Plymouth. — Kindness of the Inhabitants. — Death of Sir Richard Hill. — General Hill appointed the Third Garrison Battalion — Sent to Portugal. — Anxiously expected by Sir John Cradock. — Letter of Sir J. Cradock. — Sir Arthur Wellesley arrives at Lisbon . . . . .

Acquaintance of the Prince of Orange. — Villa Viçosa. — Portalegre. — Letters of General Hill. — Portuguese Troops. — General Hill operates against Girard. — Arroyo ■■■■■ — Surprise of Girard. — General ■■■■■ Hurrah. — Humour of the Highlanders — Panic of the French — Pursuit ■■■ the Sierra Montanches — Triumph of the Day. — Escape of Girard. — Prince D'Artemberg and other Prisoners. — Lord Wellington's satisfaction at this Achievement. — Recommends General Hill to the Prince Regent. — General Hill's Popularity with the Army — His own Description of Arroyo de Molinos. — Flattering Congratulations. — Captain C. Hill takes home the Despatches — His Reception in England. — Letter of Prince D'Artemberg. — Lord Mulgrave. — General Hill promised the Order of the Bath. — New Movements. — Estremadura. — Ciudad Rodrigo. — Gallantry of Colonel T. N. Hill — New Plans. — Speech of the Prince Regent. — Investment of the Order of the Bath — Sir Rowland Hill's Repugnance to be called by his ■■■■ Title. — Supporters — Fall of Badajos. — New Projects. — Almaraz - - - - - Pag. 157

CHAPTER VIII.

Major Currie at Head-Quarters — His Letters to Sir Rowland Hill. — Reception of the News from Almaraz in England. — The Guerillas. — Letter of Joseph Bonaparte to Brown — Sir Sir Rowland Hill prepared. — General Slack's Affairs. — Sir Rowland arrives at Albuera. — His Caution and Judgment — Letters to Lord Wellington. — His Lordship's Wishes anticipated. — Zafra. — Prudent Considerations. — Lord Wellington enters Madrid. — Soult alarmed. — Movements of ■■■ French. — Sir Rowland crosses the Tagus. — Examination of Mirabete. — Letter from Carpio — General Alten. — Sir Rowland "well posted to stop King Joe." — Aravaca. — Sir Rowland marches to join Lord Wellington. — Reports — Sir Rowland reaches the Plains of Old Castile. — Close Communication with Lord Wellington. — Sir Rowland elected Member of Parliament for Shrewsbury. — Roldeda. — Coria. — Winter Quarters - 197

CONTENTS

CHAPTER IX

Lord Wellington's Circular. — Neglect of Religious Instruction in the Army. — Remontrances. — Religious Soldiers. — Sir Rowland Hill's Personal Influence. — Striking Description of it. — Lord Wellington goes to Cadix. — Sir Rowland in command. — Ballesteros. — News from Russia. — Talk of the French. — Officers' Reports. — Plundering prevented. — Battle. — Captain Egerton. — Sir Rowland Hill's Account of the Enemy's Force. — Long Marches. — Dinner à-tre-co. — March. — Castle of Burgos blown up. — King Joseph enters the Basin of Vittoria. — Route of Sir R. Hill. — Splendid Scenery. — Starving Portuguese. — Battle of Vittoria. — Pampeluna. — Approaches towards France. — Sir Rowland ascends the Pyrenees. — The plan to drive the French out of Spain. — Letters concerning Officers. — Soult in command of 'the Army of Spain.' — The Battles in the Passes of the Mountains. — Termination of the Conflict of the Pyrenees. — Roncesvalles. — St. Sebastian. — The T. N. Hill. — Sir Rowland watches the Movements of Soult. — The Comte de L'Abisspal's Thirst for Glory. — Deep snow on the Mountains. — Letters to Sir George Murray. — Page ■■■

CHAPTER X

Strength of the Enemy. — Position of the Nivelle. — Sir Rowland's Position. — An attack on him foreseen by Lord Wellington. — Battle of the Nive. — Compliment of Lord Wellington. — Major Clement Hill sent home with the News. — French Boats on the Adour. — Intimacy between the French and English Soldiers. — Patten and his "Pawn." — Admirable Conduct of Sir Rowland. — Stratagems of the Enemy. — New Movements of the Army. — Lord Wellington's Design effectually concealed. — Successes of Sir Rowland. — Orthez. — Lord Wellington reconnoitres. — Battle of Orthez. — Battle of Aire. — Death of Colonel Hill. — Battle of Tarbes. — Arrangements for passing the Garonne. — Sir Rowland in the Suburbs of Toulouse. — Battle of Toulouse. — Arrival of Colonel Cook. — Abdication of Bonaparte. — Armistice. — Sir Rowland makes a Po. — ■■■

CHAPTER XI

Lord Hill arrives in London. — Proposal for his going ■ America. — Breakfast at the Hanover Hotel. — Spoils of Vittoria. — Heapey's Picture. — Presentation of a Sword by the City of London. — Shaking Hands. — Lord Hill at Hawkstone. — The The Birmingham Swind. — Rejoicings at Shrewsbury. — Sir John Hill. — Scene in the Quarry — Lord Hill obliged to fly from his Friends. — Column at Shrewsbury. — Chester. — Mrs. Wintfield. — Letter of Lord Bathurst. — Letter of the Duke of York. — Spring of 1815 — Important Mission. — Instructions. — Interview with the Prince of Orange. — The Duke of Wellington arrives at Brussels. — Lord Hill's position at Grammont. — Troops of Prince Frederic. — Lord Hill's Information respecting the Enemy. — Orders. — Waterloo. — Lord Hill's Part in the Battle. — Night in the Cottage — Memorandum ■ the Spot by Sir Digby Mackworth. — France. — Letters. — Guelphic Order. — Cold Chasp for Orthez. — Paris. — Lord Hill's Party fired at. — Quietism. — Bois de Boulogne. — Remarks. — Page 288

CHAPTER XII.

Entail of Lord Hill's Peirage. — He goes to Cambrai. — Trying Facts. — Noble Letter of the Duke of Wellington. — Sportsmen at Cambrai. — Boar-hunt. — Château Maniers. — Severe Illness. — Kindness of the Duke of Wellington. — Mont St. Martin. — Tour in the Netherlands. — Lord Hill visits Waterloo. — Quietism at Cambrai. — Lord Hill in his Family Circle after leaving Cambrai. — His Country Life. — Southey's Peninsular War. — Lord Hill's Nephew elected M. P. for Shropshire. — Death of Sir John Hill. — The young Sir Rowland Hill moves the Address ■ the House Commons. — Letter of Mr. Willerforce. — Lord Hill offered the Command in India and the Master Generalship of the Ordnance. — He declines both. — The Duke of Wellington Prime Minister. — Proposal to Lord Hill ■ take the Command in Chief of the Army. — He accepts it. — General Orders. — Horse Guards. — Room with ■ Chair. — Lord Hill unwell. — Kindness of George IV. — His Majesty's last Act in favour of Lord ■ — William IV. — Letter of Sir Herbert Taylor. — Lord Hill's Dinner ■ ■ King. — His high Sense of Duty. — The Steam Coach. — The Officer that could not ride. — Note to the Lord and Lady Mayoress. — Observations. — 318

CHAPTER XIII.

Private Thoughts of Lord Hill. — Dinners at Lord Tighmouth's on the Anniversaries of the Bible Society. — Lord Hill's Conduct with regard to the Reform Bill. — Letter to Sir Rowland Hill. — Conversation with the King. — The "Crown" won and preserved. — Uniform of George III. — Fête at Westbourne House. — Death of Sir Noel Hill. — Lord Hill's Attention to his County. — Anecdotes. — Death of the Rev. Rowland Hill. — Lord Hill attends his Funeral. — Instances of Lord Hill's Prudence and Firmness. — Carries the Banner at the Funeral of William IV. — Queen Adelaide. — His first Audience with Her present Majesty. — Lord Hill and Marshal Soult. — Canada. — The Duke of Wellington's Love of Truth. — Northamptonshire Roads. — Royal George and Colonel Pasley. — Mrs. Winchell. — Fire at the Tower. — Westminster Hall saved by Lord Hill. — Compliments of the Duke of Wellington. — Remarks of Lord Hill on the Whig Government. — His Motives of Action. — Page 349

CHAPTER XIV.

Failure of the Health of Lord Hill. — Goes to Richmond, and calls on Lord Sidmouth. — Remarkable Conversation. — Takes a Villa at Fulham. — At Hardwick during the Visit of the King of Prussia. — Regret expressed at his Inability to go to Windsor. — Death of Sir Francis Hill. — Lord Hill exhausted by his Business. — Dinner with the Duke of Sussex. — Colchill. — Determines to resign. — Speaks to the Duke of Wellington. — Letter of Resignation to Her Majesty. — The Queen's gracious Reply. — Answer of Lord Hill. — Takes leave of the Horse Guards. — General Order. — Colonel Egerton. — Secretaries at War in office during Lord Hill's Command. — Letter of Sir Henry Hardinge. — General Order of the Duke of Wellington. — Lord Hill made a Viscount. — His declining State of Health. — Last Letter to Colonel Egerton. — Lord Hill's last Illness. — His Devotion and Penitence. — His Death. — Condolences. — Funeral. — Death of Mrs. Hill. — Her Character. — Sir Robert Hill and General Clement Hill. — Concluding Remarks. — 367

L I F E

L O R D H I L L.

CHAPTER I.

CHARACTERISTICS OF THE HILL FAMILY. — THE FIRST SIR ROWLAND HILL — HIS NAMESAKE LORD HILL. — HIS PARENTAGE AND BIRTH. — HIS BROTHERS AND SISTERS. — COMPLIMENT OF GEORGE IV. — MR JOHN HILL. — LORD HILL'S MEMORANDA OF HIS EARLY LIFE. — HIS CONDUCT AT SCHOOL. — HIS MODESTY AND DELICATE HEALTH — HIS SENSIBILITY. — ANTIQUARIES. — CHOICES THE ARMY. — HIS OWN ACCOUNT. — OBTAINS AN ENSIGNCY IN THE 35TH REGIMENT. — GOES TO A MILITARY ACADEMY AT STRASBURG. — LIEUTENANT IN THE 53RD — ■■■■■■ PERSH TO STRASBURG. — TOUR — THE BATTLE OF CHAMPAGNE. — SCOTLAND. — TOURS IN HIS REGIMENT. — MADE CAPTAIN. — BELFAND — HOUSE TOURS AND WEDDINGS. — DUBLIN. — PROMOTION OF GENERAL O'HARA — ACTION AT DUBLIN. — NARROW ESCAPE. — LORD MURRAY AND CAPTAIN HILL. — WOUNDS. — TAKES HOME DESPATCHES. — MAJOR IN THE 90TH — MR GRAHAM. — LIEUTENANT-COLONEL OF THE 90TH. — ROLESPIERE AND O'HARA. — EVENTS OF THE DAY. — STADTHOLDER AT HAWKSTONE. — 1811 DUEL. — GREAT FEAR — GENERAL O'HARA. — SIR RALPH ABERCROMBY. — TUNNS AND THEIR ALIENATION. — RI WARRE.

THE patriotism and benevolence so admirably blended together in the character of the late Lord Hill, were the fruits of a rare union of firmness and kindness which has distinguished other eminent members of the ■■■■■ family, and may be said to be ■ property of their race. It obtained for Richard "the Great Hill" the confidence of his sovereigns, respect in courtly circles, success in his diplomatic undertakings, influence with the army, attention from the legislature of his native realm, and the esteem of all classes of society. The same excellence raised the first Sir Rowland Hill—a column to whose memory adorns the romantic park at Hawkstone—to the enviable honour of being the first Protestant Lord Mayor of the city of London. He was truly designated "a grave and worthy father of the citye," for by his munificence he added to its approaches, and by his charities enriched its hospitals. When sheriff, he was committed to the Tower for a defence of what he believed to be its privileges, against the power of Parliament; but his high reputation quickly moved the Speaker and the Commons to give him his release. He embellished his native county with religious and useful erections, and made the homes of his tenants happy by his liberality as a landlord. The exemplary and illustrious nobleman whose life will form the subject of these pages was the inheritor of his name, and of his virtues, with a wider scope for their development. In my biographies of two eminent members of his family*, I have shown the antiquity of his descent, and exhibited the claims of his ancestors and contemporary relatives, to the respect of the nation and the gratitude of their county. I shall therefore proceed at once to trace that brilliant and modest career, which terminated in his elevation to the command in chief of the forces of Great Britain, and led to the rank of Viscount in the peerage, with descent to the representative of the elder branch of the house of Hawkstone.

* The Rev. Rowland Hill, and Richard Hill. M. P. for Shropshire.

The retired village of Prees has the honour of being the birth-place of this amiable and brave man, where his father, Mr. John Hill, who succeeded to the title and estates of his brother Sir Richard Hill, occupied the Hall, till the decease of the latter placed him in possession of the mansion of his family. He married Mary, the youngest daughter of John Chambré, Esquire, of Petton, in the county of Salop, and was the father of no less than sixteen children. Their names and order of birth are as follow:—John, Mary, Jane, Rowland, the subject of this memoir, Richard, Elizabeth Hannah, who died in infancy, Elizabeth, Harriet, Robert Chambré, Francis Brian, Emma, Clement, Charles, who died an infant, Thomas Noel, William Henry, who died while yet a child, and Edward. Such was the numerous progeny of the parents of the late Lord Hill, five of whom the aged father was permitted to see survivors of the great conflict of Waterloo, while he himself was welcomed at court by George the Fourth, then Prince Regent, with the gratifying salutation, “I am glad, indeed, to see the father of so many brave sons.” It appears, from the list just given, that Lord Hill was the second son and fourth child of his attached parents. He was born at the Hall in the village before mentioned, about three miles from Hawkstone, and in the ■■■ county, on the 11th of August, 1772, and was nearly three years junior to his brother John, whose birthday was the 10th of October, 1769. The characteristic qualities of their minds were extremely similar, and both commenced life with the choice of the profession of a soldier. Mr. John Hill entered the Royal Horse Guards, Blue, and was engaged on foreign service in Flanders, under the command of his late Royal Highness the Duke of York. His brother Rowland said of him that "he was sure if Jack had fair play, he would manage half a dozen Frenchmen;" and that those in office entertained the same opinion, is demonstrated by the fact of his being promoted to the rank of field officer in the 25th Light Dragoons. On his marriage to Elizabeth Rodes, daughter of Philip Cornish, Esquire, of Exeter, he yielded to the earnest solicitations of his relatives, and quitted the army, but employed his military knowledge in raising and organising an effective regiment of Volunteer Cavalry in his native county. At the same time he discharged the various duties of a country gentleman, in a manner that won him the respect of all classes, exhibited in gratifying testimonials while he lived, and in unequivocal marks of universal regret when it pleased God to remove him. This unhappy event happened in the month of January, 1814; and his loss was most sincerely lamented. He left a widow with five sons, the eldest of whom is the present Viscount Hill, and two daughters, whose only consolation was the vigorous and pious mind of their bereaved mother, who happily found comfort, while she displayed consummate judgment, in daily vigilance over her children. I shall reserve further particulars of the interesting group now presented to the notice of the reader, until the appropriate periods pass under review in the course of this narrative, and at once — the history of the opening day of Lord Hill.

Nothing gives a charm to biography equal to that which results from making the subject of it speak as much as possible for himself; and fortunately Lord Hill, in the quietude of peace, drew up a memorial of his early life, from which I shall frequently have the advantage of quoting. It is dated March 25, 1822, and is entitled, "Memorandum from Authentic Papers and Recollections." He commenced it thus: "I was born August 11th, 1772. At the age of seven or eight I was sent to Ightfield School, where I remained about one year. From thence I was sent to Mr. Vanburgh's and Mr. Winfield's' schools at Chester, where I continued till I was seventeen." Both at Ightfield, which is a village in Shropshire, where he was under the instruction of a clergyman named Edwards, and at Chester, for a time, he had the advantage of numbering his brother John amongst his schoolfellows. Young Rowland manifested at this stage of life those attractive qualities of heart and manner, which caused him to be the object of such extensive esteem both in private and public during his long and arduous career. He was a great favourite with Mr. and Mrs. Winfield, and his straightforward disposition gained him the confidence of the whole school. Major Cotton of Chester, who was one of the

■ Mr. Winfield ■ a clergy- Hills, John and Rowland, with man, and second master to the some other boys, were removed and placed under his care. Winfield married in 1783, the ■ boys there with him, says, "He extremely good-natured and amiable, ever ready to assist a lad out of a scrape, and never tumbled into one himself." He also pleasantly describes him as "toiling through the week's work, without ever coming in contact with Doctor Birch or his partner Supple Jack." The Dean of Bangor, who was also a school with him at Chester, of which place his father was Dean, testifies, "He was a boy of gentle, unaffected manners, beloved by all the younger boys, and ever the friend of the oppressed." He was naturally diffident and reserved, but always willing to join in school sports, and to contribute to the amusement of others, cheerfully assisting his juniors in any little objects they had in hand. This diffidence was not the result of timidity, but was only part of that gentleness of nature which rendered the contrast of his heroism the more brilliant, just as the simplest setting displays to most advantage the beauty of some precious jewel. It was not fear, but keen sensibility, in regarding the troubles of others; and being coupled with a delicate constitution, it caused his friends some solicitude. He required many little indulgences, which brought him under the constant notice of Mrs. Winfield, whose almost maternal kindness he never forgot as long as he lived. She was spared to see him in the high situation of Commander-in-Chief; and his attentions to her at that time will be mentioned when we arrive at the proper place for their introduction. Miss Winfield, in an interesting communication of what she had heard her parents relate of him, says, "He was remarkable for the mildness and equanimity of his temper, and his kindness and sensibility to the feelings of others were evident upon ■■ occasions. His delicate health frequently prevented him joining in the athletic exercises of his ■■■■ robust companions; but his little garden, and his numerous pet animals, testified his systematic care and attention, by their succeeding better than those of his schoolfellows. My mother used to say, "Every thing that Rowland Hill undertook prospered." With regard to his fondness for his garden, and his love of animals, if Miss Winfield had written the account of his rural pleasures in later life, she could not have hit upon subjects more characteristic of him. His garden at Hardwick was the most productive for its size I have ever seen, and he constantly won the best prizes at the Salop Horticultural shows; while his fondness for tame animals of all descriptions, and his delight in exhibiting them and watching them, are notorious to his friends. With respect to the tenderness of his spirit, Miss Winfield further observes, "His sensibility was almost feminine. One of the boys happened to cut his finger, and was brought by Rowland Hill to my mother to have it dressed; but her attention was soon drawn from the wound to Rowland, who had fainted." Mrs. Winfield, happening to see him on a visit to Chester — for he invariably sought her out at every opportunity — after one of his achievements in the war, brought this fact to his recollection, remarking that she wondered how he could have acted with such coolness and vigour in the midst of the dreadful ■■■■ of carnage surrounding him. "I have still," he replied, "the ■■■■ feelings; but in the excitement of battle all individual sensation is lost sight of." Just before he joined his regiment for the first time, he sickened at the sight of a human heart preserved in spirits, shown him by his medical attendant; and after he had entered on his military duties he was unable to look at a prize-fight between Humphries and Mendoza, near the windows of his lodging, and was taken out fainting from the room. No common observer would have imagined for an instant that the army could have been his choice; yet every one knows that bully and coward may be almost placed in the list of synonyms, as gentleness and bravery, sensibility and courage, and we may add humility and piety, are capable of a similar classification.

In the spring of the year 1790 his parents suggested to him the choice of some profession, and seemed desirous that he should adopt that of the law. His reply still remains in the original letter he addressed to his mother from Chester, on the 6th of March in that year. An extract from it will exhibit his own view. "Last Wednesday," he wrote, "I received your very kind letter, in which you desired I would let you know what profession I should really like best. I know it is your's and Papa's wish that I should be in the law, but I hope you will forgive me if I say I should not like that line of life; for, indeed, I have a dislike to the law, and am sure I should neither be happy, nor make any figure, as a lawyer. The profession which I should like best, and I hope you and Papa will not object to, is the army." To this letter, which was transmitted to his father, that kind-hearted and affectionate parent replied in the following terms:—

“My dear Rowland,

“Your mother me the letter you wrote her, whereby I find you wish to decline following the line of life we had chalked out for you, and expressing a wish to go into the army. Now, my dear lad, do not think me in the least angry with you for coming to this resolution, but rather glad that you have declared your sentiments, though I wish they had been for what struck out for you, I think your prospect of comfort and happiness, and perhaps cutting a figure in life, would have been much greater in the former than in the latter line. You know my situation, and that I can do very little more for my family than putting them in a way to get their living, and giving them the best advice in my power.

“Immediately on seeing your letter, I consulted those whom I thought most likely to inform me on the best plan for a young man to pursue who went into the army. What is most recommended is to go to a foreign academy for about two years, where strict attention to the several studies necessary to cut any figure in the profession must be attended to. By great favour, a commission may be purchased before you go abroad, with leave of absence, whereby you may stand a chance of creeping a little forward towards rank, the same as if you were with the regiment. This, to be sure, is a more expensive plan than I can well afford; but I have not a doubt but you will make every proper return, I will exert myself to put it, something of the sort, into execution (provided you continue in your present resolution); for I much dread the idea of a young man starting in any line of life without his being determined to use his utmost endeavours to advance in it, which I am well assured one in the military line, any than any other, without proper previous education. It true, a commission may be purchased for a few hundred: but what a miserable situation for a young man of spirit, with scarce any thing ■■■ three and sixpence per day, to saunter about from town to town, unless he has a good prospect of advancing from it. I returned from London last night, but shall go back again in the Easter week, when some plan for you must be determined on. In the meanwhile seriously reflect upon what I have said above, and believe me to be “ Your sincere friend, ■■■ well as

“ Your most affectionate father,

“ J. H.

“ I think I will ask Mr. Winfield to let you come over to Pres for a very few days at Easter. It is, at all events, probable you will not leave him before Midsummer. Do attend as much as possible to your French.”

After this judicious statement of his views, Mr. Hill speedily obtained the desired commission for his son. It is stated in Lord Hill's own memoranda, “ I got an ensigncy in the 38th Regiment, and obtained leave of absence to go to Strasburg, where I remained till the 24th of January, 1791, ■■■ which day my commission ■■■ Lieutenant in Captain Broughton's Independent Company is dated. During the time I was in this company I was quartered with it at Wrotham in Kent. On the 16th of March, 1791, I ■■■ appointed Lieutenant in the 53rd, or Shropshire Regiment of Foot. On receiving this appointment I obtained leave to return to Strasburg, and had not been there many weeks when Sir Richard Hill, Reverend Brian Hill, and my brother John ■■■ to Strasburg on their return to England from Italy. France at this time ■■■ much disturbed, and it ■■■ thought advisable that I should accompany Sir Richard to England, which I did, by a pleasant tour down the Rhine through Holland, Flanders, and the Netherlands. We arrived at Hawkstone the end of the summer." The 38th Regiment, in which Lord Hill commenced the duties of a soldier, was commanded by Sir Robert Pigot: and he was exceedingly esteemed by all his brother officers. His worthy uncle and godfather, Sir Richard Hill, placed him in a military academy at Strasburg, with a view to his improvement in the knowledge of the profession which he had now embraced; and it was for this purpose, and not for any object of ease or pleasure, that his leave of absence was procured. As he advanced, it was not by favour but by service, for he added twelve men to Captain Broughton's Independent Company before he was promoted to a lieutenancy under that officer.* At this time the relations alluded to by Lord Hill were on an extensive continental tour, and had left him to proceed with his military studies, and gone to Venice. Before they parted they were all put into high spirits by an amusing accident to Mr. Brian Hill. Their landlady, to do them honour, insisted on bringing forth a bottle of special Champagne Mousseux from her own vineyard. Mr. Brian Hill happened to be close against the mouth of the bottle at the instant the cork was unloosed, and out it flew with the fury of a pistol-shot, and half the contents spirted over him. He looked as most men would, completely wetted, with no change of clothes unpacked, while the landlady, instead of making apologies, laughed vociferously, and cried out with evident delight, "Monsieur, comment vous trouvez-vous?" The good-natured sufferer then said, "I have the advantage of you now, for I boast of wearing a dress that has been washed in champagne." This cheerful party had scarcely reached Venice, before the subject of this incident wrote to his sister to mention that directions had been given to young Rowland to return home. His words are "The post that brought yours brought one from Pecos with information of Rowly's preferment. It went immediately to Strasburg with directions for him to return to England, where I presume he will go directly, unless he receives a letter from his father in the mean time to forbid him." He did return to England, and, as he has stated, was quartered in Kent.

* Since J. Broughton, Baronet.

On his removal into the 53rd Regiment, at that time commanded by Major Mathews, his return to Strasburg was permitted for the sake of perfecting himself in military knowledge, until he was taken home, as he has recorded, by his relatives. His own account proceeds—"I remained in Shropshire till the January following, and joined my regiment (the 53rd), on the 18th of that month in Edinburgh Castle. We marched from thence about Midsummer to Ayr, where I was stationed about two months, and then sent on detachment with a command of eighteen to Ballantrae, where I remained till the end of 1792."

During this time of service in the North the amiable young officer won the regard of the whole regiment, and gave many indications of those estimable merits of conduct and amenity of deportment which shone forth ■ conspicuously ■ his star of fortune ■■ to a higher elevation. A letter from Major Mathews to Sir Richard Hill has been preserved, which gives testimony to the truth of this assertion. It is as follows :—

“ Sir,

“ Ayr, 12th Sept. 1792.

“ Tempted by the opportunity, and encouraged to embrace it by the ■■■■■ of Lord Balgonie that it would not be disagreeable to you to hear from me, though I have not the honour of being known to you, I presume to take this liberty in justice to your nephew, Mr. Hill, of the 53rd Regiment, whom I have had under my particular observation and direction since he joined the regiment at Edinburgh, and who, desirous of paying his duty to you, accompanies Captain Houghton, of the 53rd, who will have the honour to deliver this to you, to Buxton. You, sir, are sufficiently acquainted with the many good qualities of this excellent young man, not to be under any apprehensions for his conduct when at a distance from you. I nevertheless think it will be satisfactory to you, and to Mr. Hill, his father, to learn from ■■ that, ■ an officer, his talents, disposition, and assiduity are of the most promising nature; and that his amiable manners, sweet-■■■■ of temper, and uncommon propriety of conduct, have not only endeared him to the regiment, but procured him the most flattering attentions from an extensive circle of the first fashion in this country. And with regard to the regiment and myself, in ■ selfish point of view, it is with much regret that I look forward to the probability of our losing him ere very long; for, with the advantages which he possesses, it is scarcely ■ ■ expected that he will wait the ■■■■■ of promotion in any one regiment. Whenever this shall happen, it will be very much lamented by ■ all, and by ■ ■ more than him who requests your forgiveness for the liberty he ■■ taken, and who has the honour to subscribe himself, sir,

“ Your most obedient and most humble servant,

“ R. MATHEWS, Maj. 53rd Regt.”

It has rarely happened ■ any one to be endowed with an equal firmness of purpose in pursuit of his ■ designs, combined with the same forgetfulness of self, which marked the conduct of him to whom such ■ tribute of regard was paid by his ■ manding officer. Throughout life his attention to others was as remarkable ■ his vigilance over his own interests. When invited, ■ ■ boy at school, to the deanery at Chester, his chief object ■ to divert the children of the family, who were younger than himself; and, though manly for his age, he would pass his afternoons in helping them to swim their little ships in a cistern on their father's premises, and in raising mimic storms for their enjoyment, evidently best pleased when he could most amuse others. Hence his presence always afforded gratification, and his departure was viewed with regret; while all reflecting persons who regarded his talents, marked him out in their opinions as one born to rise to eminence, and adorn it.

The prognostication of Major Mathews ■ ■ ■ verified. Determined to advance himself, Lieutenant Hill made a successful effort to raise his rank in the army. His own account continues—"In the beginning of 1793 I raised ■ independent company, and on the 23rd of March in that year I got my ■ mission ■ captain." The ■ were raised chiefly in Shropshire: they were approved of by General Fox, at Chatham. On the 12th of April I embarked with this company in the Aurora transport; arrived at Cork in the ■ of one week; marched from Cork, by orders from Sir David Dundas, about the end of April, to Belfast, where I delivered the men of my company over to the 38th Regiment, and returned to Shropshire about June." During the short time he was in Ireland, where he was much noticed, he paid a visit to an eminent literary gentleman, well known as one of the most brilliant sons of Erin. I remember his telling me, that, on going to his house to pass a night, he was shown to his room before dinner, and being about to dress, he looked round for the usual washing apparatus, but could see nothing of the sort. Just as he was at the point of making an effort to obtain these requisites of the toilet, he heard to his great surprise and amusement a creaking in the floor, and a trap-door gradually opened, through which ascended, by a steady invisible movement, wash-stand, basin, towels, hot-water, and all other due accompaniments. He used to say he never met with a parallel to this, except in the house of a gentleman who had a railroad made from his kitchen to his dining-room, to send in the dishes quick and hot. Among other invitations in Ireland, he received one to a wedding of a Protestant gentleman to a Roman Catholic lady. It happened to be a Popish fast-day, but the bridegroom, not thinking it necessary to keep it, permitted the Protestant guests to help him to a variety of good things at the table; but soon as the bride perceived that any of them contained animal food, she desired a servant to take his plate away from him. The company were highly excited by this commencement of a wedded life; and at last one of them proposed a resolution, that if Papists and Protestants chose to wed, their friends in this neighbourhood at least should protest against its being on fast-days. Lord Hill used to ■■■ this story with great humour. The lady herself only gave ■ specimen of what her mother church would do in higher matters, if the half-Romanist ■■■■ ments of the age should induce any alliance with her. Soon after he left Ireland, not being attached to any corps, Captain Hill accompanied Mr. Drake to Genoa. "Thence," he says, "I proceeded to Toulon, and ■■■ employed ■■ aid-de-camp to Lord Mulgrave, General O'Hara, and Sir David Dundas." The impression he made on these officers, while on the staff of each in succession, was of the most favourable kind; and General O'Hara emphatically predicted his future distinction in the service. One day as he quitted the room this general said to those present, "That young man will rise to be one of the first soldiers of the age." Captain Hill's first active services commenced at this period, and I give his own reminiscences of the proceedings in which he was engaged:—

"Lord Hood took possession of Toulon, August, 1793. On the 6th of September Lord Mulgrave arrived there. About a week afterwards I joined his Lordship, who, at my earnest request, appointed me his aid-de-camp—a situation I preferred much to being an assistant-secretary to Mr. Drake. On the 30th of September the enemy got possession of the important port of Faron. This information ■■■ brought to Lord Mulgrave by Mr. Graham.* His Lordship, with great quickness and decision, attacked and drove the enemy back amidst great difficulties. On this occasion I ■■■ aid-de-camp. On the 11th of October we destroyed the batteries in the Hauteur de Reinière. On the 9th a spirited sortie by our troops; on the 15th the enemy got possession of Cape le Brun. About this time General O'Hara arrived to take the command, Lord Mulgrave returned to England, and I remained with General O'Hara as his aid-de-camp. I remember General O'Hara being much displeas'd at the favourable report made by Lord Mulgrave of the state of affairs at Toulon, the general adding that it was quite impossible to keep the place — that is, Toulon and the harbour — with so small a force. The French having erected a battery against the Port of Malbourquet, General O'Hara, on the 30th of November, prepared to destroy it; for which purpose Sir David Dundas march'd in, before day-break, with two thousand men, compos'd of five nations, British, French Loyallists, Neapolitans, Spaniards, and Piedmontese. Sir David succeed'd in obtaining full possession of the height and battery; but the impetuosity of some of the troops led them to pursue the flying enemy, whilst others were occupi'd in plundering the enemy's camp. In this scatter'd and irregular state, the enemy, who had collect'd in great force, made an attack, and oblig'd us to relinquish the advantages we had gain'd. General O'Hara arriv'd at the redoubt as it was taken, and, perceiv'g the disorder of the troops, was extremely displeas'd at their having left the hill. He us'd every exertion to form the troops, and sent me to bring up the artillery-men, and order these to spike the guns, and destroy them as effectually as possible.

* ■■■■■■■■■■ Lynedoch.

This was the last time I saw General O'Hara*; for before I returned to the battery he received a wound, and was taken prisoner. During the time General O'Hara was prisoner, he was treated very ill. On our return to the town, which we did with great haste, Sir David Dundas assumed the command, and I was appointed one of his aids-de-camp."

The conduct of Captain Hill, modestly passed over by himself, was, on all these occasions, the subject of high encomium from those under whom he served. Lord Mulgrave wrote thus to Mr. Drake on the subject: — "For the particulars of our action of the 1st of October, I must refer you to your relation and my friend and aid-de-camp, Captain Hill, who was in the midst of it, and whose intelligence, activity, and courage rendered him of great service to me." He had a most providential escape just at the time when General O'Hara was taken prisoner. He was called down by that general from a tree, into which he had climbed to make observations, and Captain Snow, his brother aid-de-camp, having ascended to replace him, was instantly killed. Captain Hill was, however, wounded slightly in the right hand, which he does not notice, nor the fact of his having had committed to him the direction of the retreat to Toukon, which he conducted in the most satisfactory manner. His talents gained confidence, and his unpretending demeanour and affection, so that he seemed ever to regard him with jealousy. How his superior officers felt towards him, though still a young man, * [REDACTED] means, on this occasion.

will be easily collected from a letter of Lord Mulgrave, who had left him at Toulon :—

Dear Hill,

Harley Street, Nov. 28. 1793.

“I have this morning seen Sir Richard Hill, who is very much delighted with your conduct at Toulon, and happy to hear that you are in General O'Hara's family. I enclosed your letter to your father, and wrote him an account of you. I shall be happy to hear from you when you have any good news to send from Toulon. Pray speak to Barailly about the drawing of Mount Faron, which Michel, of the Marine Engineer corps, has made for me, and send it by the first favourable opportunity, and let me know if there is any thing I can send Monsieur Michel from England, in return for his trouble, that may be useful to him, and which is not to be got at Toulon. Pray remember me to Rudwell, Smith, &c.

Yours sincerely,

MULGRAVE.”

On the 13th of December, 1793, Lord Hood and Sir David Dundas sent Captain Hill with despatches to England, where he arrived on the 13th of January, 1794. Sir David observed, in his despatch, “This will be delivered by Captain Hill, a very deserving young man, who has been aid-de-camp to Lord Mulgrave, Lieutenant-General O'Hara, and myself.” “These despatches,” we learn from Lord Hill's own memoranda, “contained the difficulties of the situation of our navy and army. The evacuation of Toulon took place on the 18th and 19th December, 1793. On my return to England I met the Duke of York at Ghent. His Royal Highness commanded the allied armies in Flanders at this time. I breakfasted with him and his secretary, and reported the accounts from Toulon.”

Amongst those who witnessed the admirable conduct of Captain Hill at Toulon was the veteran Lord Lynedoch, then Thomas Graham, Esq., serving as a volunteer, and gaining great honour. His admiration of this young officer was such as to create in him a desire that he should serve in the 90th regiment with himself. Accordingly, Lord Hill has made the following entry of this circumstance in his own notes: — “In the early part of 1794 Mr. Graham raised a regiment of infantry, and offered to the majority of it on raising a certain quota of men.” With his usual simplicity and conciseness, he merely added to the record of the proposal, “This I did.” This regiment was the brave 90th, in which he was destined to win so many honours, and to gather the laurels of the highest achievements. It was afterwards augmented to a thousand strong, when he became the lieutenant-colonel on the usual terms. The year in which this body of men was first formed, was an epoch of remarkable events on the face of afflicted Europe. It was the period of the Duke of York’s operations at Cambray and Tournay, while the arrival of Lord Moira at Ostend preceded those in the Netherlands. France was agitated by the insurrection in La Vendée, and by Robespierre’s brutal administration. That talentless monster — cunning without genius, and a tyrant without a single quality calculated for wholesome rule, as well as ferocious without a spark of courage — found his sole element in fiendish cruelty. Under his hands, the captive general suffered most unworthy hardships. Lord Hill alludes to the subject thus: — “General O’Hara was treated with the utmost rigour and barbarity by him. The general has told me that he was placed in the common goal, and ■■■ fed on artichoke leaves and bullock's liver." The ills which desolated the French nation, and this barbarism towards a brave and honourable captive, convey to the whole world ■ great practical illustration of the truth, that there is no such thing ■ infidel magnanimity or atheistical virtue; and that wherever God and his Gospel are rejected, every production of nature that promotes the health of the social system, becomes stunted in its growth and bitter in its essence, while all that is destructive assumes a giant form of rank luxuriance, poisoning the air and veiling the light, whence a darkness covers the heavens, broken only at intervals by the lightning-flash and thunder-peal of anarchy and woe. From Christianity alone spring the elements of high national character, and the sources of high-minded actions; from nothing else can we ever hope to derive a wisdom we can venerate, an authority we can regard as parental, ■ goodness we can love, because we experience its blessings.

The well-known occurrences of the time now occupying our attention, are thus briefly adverted to by Lord Hill; and ■ enlargement upon them would be foreign to the object before us, I shall merely give his own words:—"The hard frost which marked the close of 1794 and beginning of 1795, enabled the French to ■■■ the Waal. The Duke of York departed for England. On the 6th of January the British army retired, or, more properly speaking, made ■ hasty retreat through Holland, suffering extreme hardships.

The Stadtholder and Prince of Orange ■■■ to England. The French took possession of Holland. In April the British troops returned to England." While the Stadtholder ■■■ in this country, he ■■■ most splendidly entertained by Sir Richard Hill at Hawkstone, where that excellent baronet drew around him the most illustrious men of his age; while his charities succoured the poor, and his protection shielded the pious, who were forgotten ■■■ opposed in those extraordinary times.

The summer of 1793 was passed by the 90th regiment, and its young lieutenant-colonel, on foreign service. It was one of the regiments which, under General Doyle, took possession of Isle Dieu, where they remained unmolested by the French till the following December. Colonel Hill, who never could be inactive, and had always a keen enjoyment of field diversions, amused himself and brother officers by coursing, keeping greyhounds for that purpose. He and his senior and friend Lord Lynedoch were kindred spirits in this respect; and the veteran, in one of his letters to Lord Hill, still preserved, commissioned him to procure pointers and setters from Shropshire for shooting—a pursuit he keenly relished throughout his very long and distinguished life. In December Colonel Hill gladly quitted Isle Dieu, where there ■■■ so little scope for the development of his military genius. "I embarked," his words are, "from Isle Dieu in the Artois, Sir Edmund Nagle's frigate. At night we ■■■ on the rocks ■■■ Quiberon, and were in considerable danger. The ship, however, reached Portsmouth in safety about Christmas-Day. The regiment afterwards ■■■ quartered at Poole for ■■■ months."

The anxious spirit of Colonel Hill could but ill reconcile itself to the narrow bounds of a small island, while the whole continent of Europe ■■■ in ■ state of agitation at the progress of Napoleon, then in the vigour of his days, and the excitement of his amazing projects. At this time his aspiring energies ■■■ engaged in the Isle Dieu, and had scarcely any thing to engage them but field-sports. In 1796 Bonaparte's Italian campaign was the wonder of the nations and the theme of every discourse, and quickened in the minds of the brave a desire for active employ. Colonel Hill, accordingly, gladly welcomed an opportunity of going abroad. "I went," he has recorded, "with the 90th to Gibraltar in the summer of 1796, where I found my old general, O'Hara, in command of the garrison. I had not seen him since the day he was taken prisoner. He received me most kindly, and gave me ■ house of his own as a quarter." The terms ■■ which Colonel Hill was with this veteran, will be perceptible from a laconic epistle to the former, who had sent his esteemed general a comfortable cloak ■■ wrapper of ■■■ kind, as a mark of his gratitude. The letter, too, is quite that of the old soldier.

■ My dear Hill,

"Convent, 26th of July, 1796.

"I am much obliged by the very comfortable present you made me yesterday. I shall, however, put off being ■■ swaddled old fellow as long as I can.

"Yours ever, most sincerely and faithfully,

"CHAS. O'HARA."

General O'Hara's kind disposition towards Colonel

Hill, founded upon a much firmer basis than a mere value of his attentions or pleasure in his society: he entirely confided in the clearness of his understanding and the soundness of his judgment; and, young as he was, he selected him for the discharge of a delicate duty. What this was, we learn from Lord Hill's notes: "In the beginning of October, 1796, General O'Hara entrusted me with a verbal communication to convey to the British ambassador at Lisbon. This communication was the expected war with Spain. It proved correct; for, before I could return, hostilities had commenced, and it was with difficulty I got back to the garrison of Gibraltar—not only from the declaration of war, but also in consequence of the illness occasioned by great exertion to accomplish the duty I was employed on for my respected general." The same spirit which breathes in this sentence, animated its worthy writer through the performance of the infinite number of arduous trusts reposed in him as he rose in the army, and brought him into the confidence with the Duke of Wellington, that he inspired in his superiors before he was called upon to serve with that illustrious leader. He knew not only how to command, but how to obey; and both by those to whom it was his province to give, and by those from whom it was his duty to receive orders, he was equally beloved.

On Colonel Hill's return to Gibraltar he found himself almost as much confined as he was in Isle Dieu, for the declaration of war between Spain and England prevented any communication with the country. Still it was the scene of much that interesting, and the focus of tidings respecting the events of the day. In February, 1797, the ██████ of Lord St. Vincent's victory ██████ the Spanish fleet on the 14th reached the garrison, to their great joy. Colonel Hill, who had █ truly keen ██████ of the ludicrous, ██████ extremely amused by the account given of ██████ of the Spanish ships which ██████ making her escape into Cadiz, and the way in which his old friend General O'Hara received it. The captain of █ cutter came and told the general that he had come ██████ her with his vessel █ she ██████ getting away. "She is wonderfully damaged," he exclaimed, "and has █ hole in her side big enough to ██████ my cutter into." "Then why on earth," replied the general, drily, "did you not do so?"

During this year England was threatened with the boasted French invasion, and, what was much more to be dreaded, █ mutiny in the navy; but the absence of Colonel Hill allowed him no acquaintance except that of distant report, with these serious affairs. In July, 1798, the mission of Lord Malmesbury to Lisle, to negotiate peace with the French, proved a failure; and Bonaparte took possession of Malta, and sought to make Egypt the scene of his conquests. The check he received from Nelson's victory at Aboukir is fresh in the recollections of █ grateful nation. Colonel Hill, however, still remained with the 90th regiment. The events of that period ██████ thus briefly summed up in his manuscript:—"In August, 1798, the French landed at Killala, under the command of Humbert. This force did not exceed 844, officers and ██████ █ remained in arms till the 8th September.

I remained with the 90th regiment, which was under the command of Lieutenant-Colonel Moncrieff, the whole of this year." He then mentions various circumstances which induced him to apply for leave of absence, "which," he adds, "was granted;" continuing, "I came to England in 1799, and remained till the expedition sailed from Portsmouth, under Sir Ralph Abercromby. My leave, ■ this occasion, was prolonged in consequence of ■ accident, occasioned by Clement's setting fire to spirits of wine, which I used for chilblains. The year 1799 exhibited a strange picture of the world turned upside down, — Turks, Mahometans, Roman Catholics, Protestants, all at war, and supporting each other. Bonaparte continued in possession of Egypt; various battles took place in that country between Mamelukes, Turks, and French. Sir Sidney Smith at Acre. In August, 1799, Sir R. Abercromby landed at the Helder. Lord Duncan commanded the fleet. The Duke of York afterwards took the command of the army." This brief epitome of events requires ■ further expansion, ■ they ■ notorious matters of history, and contain ■ particulars illustrative of the career of Lord Hill beyond the reflex effects they had upon his movements. When he came to London he ■ much struck with the noble bearing and generous spirit of Sir Ralph Abercromby, and had the privilege of conversing with that gallant officer before he sailed. He used frequently to ■ tion Sir Ralph's liberal feeling towards his sons, of whom he said, "They ought, ■ soldiers, ■ to want money. I wish them to have what is handsome, which both causes them to spend less, and never to be embarrassed by appearing needy." For himself, Colonel Hill had, notwithstanding his services, received any remuneration from the government beyond his pay, which several officers, who knew and appreciated his exertions and successes, exceedingly surprised, and did not hesitate to say. Still he was in no degree disheartened, and quietly determined to persevere in his efforts for advancement in his profession. For this purpose he was anxious to leave the service of the troops on the Continent, and applied to the Duke of York for leave to accompany his friend Mr. Drake, who was about to depart on a diplomatic journey to Switzerland, and was willing to take him. Colonel Hill made application to the Horse Guards through the secretary of his Royal Highness, to whom he wrote the subjoined letter: —

" Sir,

" I shall be extremely obliged if you will lay the following request before his Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief:

" Mr. Drake, who is going into Switzerland in a diplomatic line, has offered to take me with him; and as I am desirous of accompanying him to the Continent, with a view of seeing some service with the Austrian and Russian armies, I shall esteem it a very particular favour if the Duke of York will grant me permission to go with him. And if I find, after a short residence on the Continent, that my endeavours to serve with the armies are of no avail, I will in that case immediately proceed by way of Leghorn to join my regiment in Minorca. I beg to inform his Royal Highness that the sole motive of my making such a request is an ardent wish of improving myself in my profession.

" I have the honour to be,

" Your obedient servant,

" R. HILL, Lt. Col. 1st Regt."

The leave sought in this letter was readily granted; and how he going out with Mr. Drake, will appear in ■■■■■ to prepare himself from that gentleman.

“ My dear Sir,

“ Wells, March 12. 1800.

“ ■■■ Richard informed you of my having received orders to prepare for my immediate departure for the Continent, and of the necessity of your being ready to come to town ■■■ the shortest notice. As my instructions could not be prepared until the arrival of the Hamburgh mails, which ■■■ ice-bound in the Elbe, Lord Grenville permitted me to return hither upon condition that ■■■ should be ready to set out at forty-eight hours' notice; and as the thaw has ■■■ begun, it is probable that the mails will soon be released, and consequently that I shall very soon be called upon. I therefore beg to apprise you that it will be necessary for you to be prepared to set out for London, the moment you receive an intimation to that effect from Sir Richard. It might, perhaps, be advisable for you to forward immediately by the waggon to London, such things as you may wish to carry with you beyond what you may have daily occasion for. Francis is very well; and we all join in kind regards to your father, mother, and family.

“ Believe me to be

“ Yours, very sincerely,

“ FRANCIS DRAKE.”

Thus it seems that Colonel Hill was on the very eve of departure for the continent of Europe: and if this intention had been carried into effect, the whole future current of his life would have probably been altered, and the distinction placed within his reach, and ■■■ by him so well and so early, more tardily, if ever, awarded to the judgment, sagacity, heroism, and military talent he had ■■■ opportunity of exhibiting to admiring superiors and devoted soldiery.

We have traced the progress of his life up to the momentous period which will form the subject of the next chapter. Notwithstanding his natural sensibility, arising, not out of a pusillaninous constitution, but an amiable spirit, deeply affected by the ills of others, a latent and decided consciousness of his qualifications for such a choice, led him to select the army the sphere for their development. His indulgent and amiable father yielded to his wish, but evidently without the least conception that the germ of eminence could be effectually matured, in the midst of traits of character the very reverse of such as are usually supposed requisites for a soldier. Mr. Winfield his worthy tutor, his schoolfellows, his general acquaintances at Chester, all regarded gazette after gazette, each containing in succession stronger and stronger testimonies to his triumphs and gallant conduct, with perfect amazement, when they remembered his placid temperament, gentle bearing, and quiet demeanour, which made him the subject in boyhood of more than ordinary tenderness and care. For these attentions he cherished, from his entrance upon a military life to the latest period of his existence, a vivid gratitude. Before he went first to Toulon, when expecting to be called soon into active service, he wrote to Mr. Winfield, "Nothing, I assure you, would give me greater pleasure than to have it in my power to make you any return for the great kindness and attention you showed me during the time I was under your care,"—the sincerity of which profession he manifested on several occasions.

The secret of his constant advance at every step and every occasion was this — that to the most endearing goodness of disposition there was added a fixed, simple determination to do his duty according to the ability he possessed, and, above all, the zeal and devotedness to his country of a patriotic and courageous heart.

CHAPTER II.

COLONEL HILL'S FLAHS.— HIS ——— ——— —
 WHITELOCK. — VOYAGE. — GIBRALTAR. — O'HARA. — THE PEGASUS. — CURIOUS ——— — ——— "DIVERSION." — MALTA. — PROCEEDING
 TO EGYPT. — LORD KEITH. — THE LANDING. — BATTLE — 18TH OF MARCH. — COLONEL ——— WOUNDED: SAVED — HIS HELMET. — ——— ON BOARD ——— FOU'DROYANT. — BATTLE OF THE 21ST: ——— WOUND OF SIR R. ABERCROMBY: — — ——— TO THE ——— CABIN WITH COLONEL HILL. — HIS DEATH. —
 CAPTAIN PACHA. — PRESENTS. — THE BRAVE 90TH. — CAMPAIGN
 CONTINUED. — COLONEL HILL'S NOTES. — THE GRAND VIZIER IN THE BRITISH CAMP. — EVACUATION OF EGYPT BY THE FRENCH. — GENERAL HOPE. — CONGRATULATIONS. — JOSEPH WILLOUGHBY. — CONDUCT — THE 90TH. — THE WET CARPENTER. — DEATH AND CHARACTER OF GENERAL O'HARA. — RESULTS — THE EGYPTIAN CAMPAIGN.

ON the 1st of January, 1800, Lieutenant-Colonel Hill ——— made full Colonel; and the year itself was destined to be spent by him in very different scenes from those he had contemplated visiting under the auspices of Mr. Drake. Thus, while ——— turn the thread of our existence in one way, according to the best of our imperfect judgment, the supreme hand of Providence often ——— its direction. Mr. Drake did not go out, and this ——— the cause of Colonel Hill's finding in Egypt such ——— of military glory. His own narrative is written with his usual simplicity, both in the memoranda quoted in the last chapter, and in — small pocket journal kept amidst the sands of the desert and on the banks of the Nile. The latter record thus : " Having procured leave from the Duke of York to accompany Mr. Drake, and join my regiment by way of Italy, I waited in London months ; but finding uncertain when he to set out, and hearing the 90th Regiment was to be actively employed with Sir Ralph Abercromby, I determined to join my regiment as soon as possible ; therefore on May the 15th set out with Admiral Halloway for Portsmouth."

This diary continues : " Saturday the 24th May, embarked at Spithead on board the Pegasus, guns, fitted up troop-ship, and having board about 200 men and 80 officers, and I, being senior officer, gave out orders necessary to be observed on board — 25th dropped down to St. Helen's — 26th sailed, fine breeze — 27th fine — 28th placed the men at the guns according to the directions of Captain Pingelly." Here all the officers seem to have looked up to Colonel Hill with the greatest deference. Amongst these were Lord Blaney and others, forming the personal staff of Sir Ralph Abercromby, who had become acquainted with Colonel Hill at Portsmouth, where they were all detained several days together. " During this time," he says, " the pompous Lieutenant-Governor, General Whitelock, showed attention to all the officers except myself, which I could not account for, until his aid-de-camp told me the reason, which was, because I not in uniform when I waited him." This individual the only person in power, who appears to have slighted whom all others concurred in valuing and commending both for efficiency and conduct.

Though Colonel Hill was gentle in the extreme, he permitted any deviation from discipline. An instance occurred in proof of this while he was on board the Pegasus. An officer of that ship reported to him, on the 28th of May, having been the previous night intoxicated. This charge being fully substantiated, he says, "I assembled all the officers, and before them told — that his conduct had been highly improper, and that if he behaved in like manner again I should report him to the Commander-in-Chief. — promised to conduct himself in future as an officer; and by the approbation of all the officers he was re-admitted to their society." After passing a few more days at sea, the party landed at Mevagissey, in Cornwall, and made an expedition to see a tin-mine, and then sailed again with a fair wind. "Sunday the 1st of June" they were "off Scilly, and fell in with the outward-bound East India fleet. The commander reported the French fleet to be at sea, and imagined Lord St. Vincent was between us and it. In the evening placed the men at their quarters, two to each gun." He also arranged that three captains and six subalterns with sixty men should act as marines, and put every thing in the ship into the most complete order. On the 4th of June they fell in with Captain Legg, who also informed them that he had heard the French fleet was out; and the very next day they came upon an enemy's vessel, which they chased and fired at for four hours, but could not come up to her. After the usual occurrences of a sea voyage, they made the Straits of Gibraltar on the 10th of June; but the gun-boat not coming out to them as was expected, they did go on shore till early the next morning. Colonel Hill found his old friend General O'Hara up and on parade, and went home to breakfast with him, when "a very satisfactory conversation" ensued. After this he "walked about the garrison, and the works Landport," but "at got under weigh, and with a fair wind and large convoy waited on Sir Ralph Abercromby." In the evening a ship foul of the Pegasus, but nothing disastrous was the result. She does not seem to have been a good sailer, for on the 15th chase given by her to four vessels, all of which escaped. During this time Colonel Hill was not negligent as to improving himself in his profession, and was paying studious attention to the theory of field fortification, reading diligently on that subject. The 24th found him near Cabrera, where they were much distressed for provisions. At this place he mentions that "a pair of boots were dressed, boiled, and roasted with lemon, for dinner in the gun-room;" but he does not say with what appetite they were eaten, nor the cause of this burlesque upon their deficiency in provisions. On arriving at Majorca, they were informed by the commander that Genoa had surrendered, and was retaken by Bonaparte, and that Sir Ralph had sailed with 3000 men." They made the utmost expedition to join him off Leghorn, and were becalmed in Corsica, but reached that port on the 8th of July, when they found the place in a state of disturbance, and Sir Ralph gone to Malta. Lord Hill's remarks on Leghorn are very brief.—"10th, went on shore. Saw Lord Keith. The Queen of Naples, with Sir William and Lady Hamilton, on board the Alexander, Lord

Nelson. Most of the shops and public places shut up." It ■ on the 21st of July that he reached Minorca, where he remained till the 27th of August, when he embarked with Sir Ralph Abercromby and "an army of 12,000 men." A brief entry in his journal shows that though he had the satisfaction of joining his general, he ■ tried by indisposition. "11th September, I ■ taken very unwell, and so ill, not able to keep a memorandum. Got to Gibraltar. Day after dined with General O'Hara, but was so very ill at dinner, I was obliged to leave the room. Two days after I came on shore and lived with General Wemyss." Sir James Pulteney at this time arrived at Gibraltar with 5000 men. Soon after, the whole fleet with an army of 25,000 men, sailed for Cadiz, off which place they remained three days. "The troops were ordered to land, and General Moore's division was embarked in the boats; but before they reached the shore, they were recalled and the landing abandoned. Signal made to return to Tetuan Bay. 10th October, much better. Off the Straits of Gibraltar." These various ■ were performed with the intention of deceiving the enemy; but General O'Hara, who was labouring under impaired health and spirits, and whose tactics were all of the straightforward order, became furiously enraged at the whole proceeding. "What is the meaning of all this pretence of landing at Cadiz, passing backwards and forwards, and all the rest of it?" "It is a diversion, General," ■ the answer given to the brave and blunt veteran. "Diversion!" he exclaimed. "'Tis a diversion, for all Europe is laughing at you. Why, your commander cannot see the length of his nose; and as for your fighting-cock Moore, he has trimmed his tail! Pretty doings!" This ebullition of the worthy veteran in allusion, in the first instance, to the well-known near-sightedness of Sir Ralph Abercromby; and certainly the general could not regard the rendezvous at Gibraltar with much personal satisfaction, since the price of provisions had been enormously augmented by it. Lord Hill used to mention, that being forbidden, on account of his illness at that time, to eat any thing but fresh meat, he was obliged to give three pounds twelve shillings sterling for a turkey, and a guinea for a fowl. Of course General O'Hara could not think this increase in the expenses of his own very hospitable board by any means a diversion. And then, in those days of all-prevailing powder and pomatum, Sir John Moore had actually dared the innovation of a crop, and appeared unfrizzled and unfloured upon parade. This was the source of the second remark of the harassed old soldier, who no doubt considered, as many of his years would have done, that, with the curls and the pigtail the age of chivalry was gone.*

On the 10th of October Colonel Hill was so much better as to be able to proceed to Tetuan. "Stayed * Probably the authorities were of the opinion, at the arrival of Sir John Moore in 1808, that an attempt to cut the troops off from the sea was not to be expected. It was in July, 1808, that a universal delight was expressed by all ranks when a signal was given to proceed to the quarters:

and Cadell says, "As soon as they were on board the head-quarter ship, the adjutant, Lieutenant Russell, proceeded to them and a pattern man to the other troop-ships. The ships were kept docked, when, by a signal, the whole were hoisted on board with three cheers."

there," he says, "till a violent gale of wind from the east, obliged me to leave our anchor and come off Cape Spartel. The fleet very much scattered; all officers on salt provisions." He then continues, "Monday, October 20th, at anchor off Cape Spartel. 21st, Sir Ralph joined the fleet, after being separated in the last gale. Miserably bad; no provisions; all tired with being on board so long; very ill; returned to Gibraltar."

There seemed to be the end of this passing to and fro, while various untoward circumstances, and above all the illness which affected a constitution never robust, threatened a far different termination to those hopes of service and distinction which animated his heroic breast, than fortunately for himself and his country he was at last permitted to realize. But we will let him tell the brief tale of his own progress:—"27th, sailed from Gibraltar: contrary winds. Off Cape Gata till the 7th of November, when we made Minorca, and anchored. Still unwell. Remained at Minorca till the 16th of November: was on shore most of the time for the benefit of my health. Sailed 17th, fine wind, for Malta." There they arrived on the 20th, after a quick passage, but "blowing a gale of wind," and "the regiment disembarked, and remained on shore till the 18th of December." In his notes on this celebrated island he makes allusion to the shipwreck of St. Paul, in a manner that shows he had been an attentive reader of his Bible. The importance of this duty was often urged upon him by more than one member of his family; and hence it was he derived the solace he experienced when the light of God's Word cheered the brief evening of ■■■ long and eventful day.

The first of January, 1801, presented to his admiring view the magnificent harbour of Marmora; and better health enabled him to hear with cheerful spirits, the sounds of preparation for the campaign in Egypt. His ■■■ note runs thus:—"January 1st, 1801, Marmora; all well; wrote to Pecos; preparing for ■■■ expedition against the French troops in Egypt." Here they passed the whole month. "February 1st," he continues, "still at Marmora; dined with Lord Keith. Preparation for our departure." On the 9th there arose ■■■ "tremendous storm, accompanied with most violent thunder and lightning, and hailstones the size of a pigeon's egg." They did not sail for some time after this, ■■■ appears from his own record:—"22d, sailed from Marmora, or Marmorice, with ■■■ fleet of about 200 sail, some Turkish, some Greeks. 28d, fine wind, steering for Egypt." A more magnificent sight than the fleet under Lord Keith ■■■ scarcely be imagined; but these notes of Colonel Hill plainly prove that the noble Admiral knew better than to venture its safety by bringing it out of Marmorice harbour in ■■■ gale of wind, ■■■ has been stated by ■■■ writers. At the ■■■ time, his determination to convey the brave army on board to the coast of Egypt, manifested the most cool and masterly seamanship; for it was taken in the face of the opinion of all the pilots, who designated the attempt ■■■ less than madness, and proclaimed the landing impossible till the equinox ■■■ past. The progress ■■■ thus shortly mentioned by Colonel Hill:—"March 1st, saw Alexandria; 2d, ■■■ chored in Aboukir Bay; March, the landing was gallantly made." Thus opened that effective paign, and with it opportunities for the display of those high qualities in Colonel Hill, which brightened each time they exhibited, and at length commanded universal applause, blended with what is still valuable, universal respect.

The narrative of events in Egypt has been often enough told. I therefore proceed with Colonel Hill's modest notes of his own share in them. "12th (March), moved towards Alexandria; 13th March, attacked the French, defeated them, and gained a glorious victory. Was wounded, and went on board the expedition." This short extract is from his diary kept at the time; but the following quotation from the later memoranda will give fuller particulars:—"On the 22d February, 1801, the expedition under Sir R. Abercromby and Lord Keith weighed. On the 27th it blew tremendously. On the 1st March we anchored in the celebrated bay of Aboukir. On the 8th we landed in Egypt. On the 12th the army advanced, skirmishing with the enemy till dusk. At night, the 90th, which commanded, and the 92nd, were placed along the front of the army. On the morning of the 13th, at six, the British army began to move, the 90th regiment as its advanced guard. At this moment a considerable body of cavalry made a spirited and impetuous charge the 90th, who, as Walsh says, with the coolness and intrepidity of veterans received them, unbroken, upon the points of their bayonets. The French were obliged to retreat. I was wounded by a musket-ball, which struck the peak of the helmet, now ■ Hawkstone. After being wounded I was taken ■ board Lord Keith's ship, where I remained about three weeks, and then returned to the regiment." Colonel Hill's escape ■ truly providential; and the helmet is still kept as ■ memorial of his danger and his merciful deliverance. In the general orders of Sir Ralph Abercromby, issued the next day, was contained this unequivocal praise of the conduct of the 90th:—"He desires that Major-General Cradock will ■ the officers and men of the 90th Regiment, that their meritorious conduct commands his admiration." The description of the gallantry of the 90th by Sir Robert Wilson, plainly shows that this euconium ■ well deserved. He says, "At the ■ time the cavalry, under the orders of General Bron, charged down a height on the 90th Regiment, forming the advanced guard of the right column. This regiment, undismayed, firmly maintained its ground, and, allowing the cavalry to approach, fired such a volley as completely altered their direction, and compelled them to retreat."

Though Colonel Hill ■ rendered insensible by the violence of the concussion from the ball, which his helmet ■ mercifully permitted to arrest, he speedily revived, and was much consoled by the friendly invitation of Lord Keith to come ■ board the Foudroyant.

■ Dear Hill,

" 16th M (arch), 1801.

" I am happy to hear you are so well, and I think you will be more at ■ here than where you ■ I beg you will come, and I will do all I can ■ make the ship comfortable to you. ■ wish my poor friend Erskine were able to ■ also.

" Yours ever,

" Col. Hill, ■ Regt., Cyclopa.

" KEITH.

" Keith."

The day after the date of this invitation Colonel Hill removed to the Foudroyant. While there, still weak from the effect of his wound, he saw with grief the brave commander of the expedition brought from the battle-field of the 21st of March, to die in the same cabin where he himself was gradually recovering. He says, in his diary, "Remained on board the Foudroyant till 14th April. The glorious 21st of March, poor Sir R. Abercromby ■■■ brought ■■ board. He was in the ■■■■ cabin with ■■ and lived one week: his lady sent to Malta in the Flora."

While Colonel Hill was confined in the Foudroyant, the Capitan Pacha, who came to that ship, presented him with ■■ sabre, a gold box, and a handsome shawl, as a testimony of admiration of the gallant manner in which he had led the 90th Regiment on the 18th of March, and invited him to pay a visit to the Sultan Selim.

It ■■■ the misfortune of this brave army, which first taught Frenchmen under Bonaparte the surpassing skill and excellence both of our ■■■■ and officers, to have lost Sir Ralph Abercromby, the admirer of Colonel Hill, and his companion in the cabin of the wounded, where the latter was obliged to remain till the 14th of April. But the conflict of the 13th, and the decisive victory of the 21st of March, had rendered it impossible for the French to maintain themselves for any great length of time in Egypt. Though many that were arrayed against the English had crossed the Alps with Napoleon, they confessed that they had never fought till now. And who gave the first repulse to their hitherto undaunted assaults and victorious movements? It was the 90th Regiment, ■■■■ manded by Colonel Hill, on whom the opening ■■■■ slaughter ■■■■ directed, and whose conduct became the first omen of victory, brilliantly achieved, and only clouded by the loss of Sir Ralph Abercromby, whom every soldier loved ■■■■ a father, and confided in ■■■■ leader.

On the 19th of April Colonel Hill commanded the camp at Hamed, and on the 4th of May orders were given for the British and Turkish army to march forward. From Colonel Hill's diary it appears that "the British army consisted of Major-General Cradock's brigade, Brigadier-General Doyle's part of the reserve, four three-pounders, four six, two howitzers, and ■■■■ a few cavalry." As the British advanced, the French receded before them, till, on the 10th of May, the former marched towards Ramanieh. "About four miles," he states, "before we reached that place the enemy came out, and with cavalry and light troops skirmished with our advanced guards and light troops. Our loss ■■■■ about thirty killed and wounded, that of the Turks more considerable, that of the French may be about sixty or seventy. The French at night evacuated their position. I ■■■■ on duty, and, from the noise I heard, I imagined they were moving off. I reported the same to General Cradock. On the 11th the fort of Ramanieh surrendered. The ■■■■ day ■■■■ party of dragoons, coming from Alexandria to Ramanieh, were taken, not knowing we were in possession of the place." Ramanieh itself ■■■■ by no ■■■■ a strong fort, and the village ■■■■ filthy, but the produce of the surrounding ■■■■ try, in corn, such to cover the land like the years of plenty in the days of Joseph.

The army continued marching on without any counter till the 17th, when "a convoy, consisting of French, 400 camels, and 200 cavalry, &c., coming from Alexandria, heard of in the desert. The whole army under arms, and proceeded in different directions in three columns, and after a fatiguing march in the desert, General Doyle's brigade came up with the convoy, which surrendered. At night I had the command of the guard over them." This is Colonel Hill's account, and he proceeds:—"1st of June, the army changed its ground, and moved forward four miles. 2d, Osman Bey, with his noble cavalry, came into our camp. 4th, the army moved forward, the band of the 90th playing 'God save the King.'" A few changes occurred, and on the 16th the army "encamped before Grand Cairo;" and the next extract from the diary will inform us under what circumstances, well the events which followed:—"During the march from Hamed to Grand Cairo the weather was extremely hot, and the fatigue the soldiers endured, I believe to be unparalleled. One day, about the 20th of June, the thermometer at 120°; some say 128°: it was generally near 100°. The country we passed through was covered with corn, the finest possible. The villages were nearly the same, and all equally miserable. In general there was one mosque in each; the houses built of mud; the inhabitants naked, wretched, and savage. If the country had not been plundered by the French and Turks, ■ might have ■■ plenty of provisions. Buffaloes in great abundance. On our march every preparation, though slow, ■■ making to bring up the heavy artillery for the siege of Cairo." The result of all these demonstrations is thus mentioned :— " On the evening of the 21st I was Colonel for the day. The next morning ■ French officer came out with ■ letter for the Commander-in-Chief, in consequence of which ■ conference took place, and ended in the French agreeing to evacuate Egypt, and surrender the citadel of Cairo in twelve days."

■ July 6., the Grand Vizier came to the British camp. On the 15th of July the army began its march from Cairo, the Turks in front, then the British, and afterwards the French." The march from Cairo to Hamed occupied fourteen days, when the French, who had left the former place, moved off by divisions and embarked for France, and the British encamped among the date-trees near Rosetta. From this place General Hope's brigade marched to Alexandria; and, on the 16th of August, Colonel Hill and the 90th were placed once more in the front of the line, and soon had the pleasure of seeing the last remnant of the enemy depart from Egypt. On the 8th of September General Hope inspected the 90th Regiment, and thus addressed Colonel Hill :— " Sir, considering the service your regiment has gone through, it is impossible ■ regiment ■■ be more complete than it is at present. I have minutely inspected into every part of it, and it is with pleasure I tell you that the whole corps does you and the officers the greatest credit." He also wrote in the most commendatory [redacted] of their gallant conduct to General Hutchinson, who succeeded Sir Ralph Abercromby in the command of the British army in Egypt.

But Colonel Hill had the happiness of receiving congratulations on his escape and distinction, dearer to him than all besides. These were letters from his family and friends in England. One particularly from Sir Richard Hill, is eminently characteristic of that deservedly-popular and pious man.

“ My very dear Rowland,                      “ London, May 12. 1801.

“ With the most inexpressible pleasure and satisfaction have I this day received your letter mentioning your truly providential escape on the 13th of March, for which we can never be sufficiently thankful to Him who screened your head in the day of battle. God knows that my prayer for you, my very dear lad, has been that you may return to your anxious friends and relatives, whole in body and renewed in soul; and that the many wonderful instances you have experienced of sparing mercy, may be crowned with that greatest of all mercies, converting, saving mercy.

“ As soon as I received the most welcome epistle, I made its contents known to many who had made frequent inquiries after you; and the account has rejoiced them. Maria will have told you that [redacted] of the newspapers had stated that you [redacted] killed. However, a letter which I got from kind Mr. Addington dispersed, or rather prevented, [redacted] apprehensions [redacted] that account, [redacted] it [redacted] the first which we had from any quarter, and, indeed, was written before any other accounts had transpired.

“ I believe that all the letters you have forwarded to England have been received. Yours written to [redacted] from Malta [redacted] duly to hand.

“ Maria doubt sent you what domestic be stirring. However, certainly is not much. The best piece of news you can send us in return, is that we may venture to entertain hopes of seeing you before long in England; and I hope you will not fail to bring with you the friendly helmet which first received the ball, and prevented the stroke from being fatal to the

“ Our stay in town will be very short; and indeed the country is now so delightful, that I not how I visit the romantic at Hawkstone.

“ As it is by no means certain when this may reach you, or, indeed, whether you will get it at all, I will more but that my best wishes and prayers follow you whithersoever you go, and that I remain, with love from all here, the Tudways, &c. &c.,

“ My very dear Rowland,
 “ Yours most affectionately and truly,
 “ B. H.”

All the domestic news was sent to Colonel Hill in the way Sir Richard supposed, and that in a most engaging and talented style of writing. One piece of intelligence his sister made known to him the determination of his servant, who had been ill at Hawkstone for some time, to set off at all hazards to attend him in Egypt, the instant he heard of his being wounded. She also communicated to him the deep concern of other humble individuals in the employment of the family, whose attachment his kind and condescending treatment had won. Nor did she forget to mention the state of his pheasants and his poultry, which were the subjects of his amusement when at home. Nothing was more remarkable in his and winning disposition, than the contrast exhibited in his indulgence to dependants, and fondness for tame animals, to the vigour of his military command, and the splendour of his victories. On the latter, ■■ regarded the campaign now before ■■ view, he ■■ thus congratulated by the gallant founder of his regiment:—

“ Dear Hill,

“ London, May 23. 1801.

“ I rejoice to hear you are doing so well, and most sincerely congratulate you on the conduct of the regiment, which I ■■■ doubted would distinguish itself, though certainly the occasion ■■ the most trying possible, and its behaviour has established its reputation for ever. I am extremely hurried, and have only time to request you will ■■■ them all of the pride and satisfaction I have felt on this glorious occasion. With the best and sincerest wishes, I remain, “ Ever most truly yours,

“ THOS. GRAHAM.

“ Col. Hill, 90th Regt.”

These letters reached Colonel Hill in the midst of his arduous duties; and the care with which he preserved them in after-life, best proves the welcome comfort they conveyed to him amidst the sands and conflicts of Egypt. Notwithstanding his military occupations, he found time to visit every object of curiosity in Cairo, Alexandria, and the Pyramids. He quitted Egypt ■■ the 23d of September, carefully superintending the embarkation of his regiment, and on the 9th of October anchored at Malta. Here he lost the faithful servant, who had left the comforts of Hawkstone to attend his wounded master. His ■■■ was Joseph Willoughby, and he died ■■ the 18th of October. The regiment stayed at Malta till the ■ of February, 1802; and this honorable testimony to its conduct still remains in the handwriting of its beloved Colonel:— "On the regiment quitting Malta every ■ spoke highly of the corps, particularly General Vallette, who expressed regret that it ■ leaving his garrison. No soldier of the 90th ■ punished ■ the public parade;— two tried, but both acquitted. Received great civilities from Lord Keith, General Fox, and all the general officers." On the passage from Malta to Gibraltar they were twice in the most imminent danger, but had what Colonel Hill very appropriately calls, each time, "a most providential escape." On the 11th of March they encountered ■ tremendous storm. The ■ "broke in upon the quarter-gallery of Colonel Hill's vessel, and nearly covered the cabin." Observing the carpenter putting in the dead-lights, he inquired of him, in his usual quiet manner, "Any damage done, Carpenter?" "No," said he, coolly, "only poor carpenter wet." On the 12th the storm abated, and the rock of Gibraltar once ■ greeted his eyes, which had anticipated the satisfaction of beholding the countenance of his esteemed friend General O'Hara lighted up with joy ■ he recounted to him the adventures and conquests of Egypt. But this pleasure was not awarded to him; the first news he heard being that of the death of the excellent Governor, — "his worthy, good and ever-to-be-lamented friend." He has thus expressed his sentiments towards him:— "His abilities as an officer, and his character as a man, never were ■ passed. Some say he was passionate;— those who have deserved ■ have received it strongly from him ;—those who have not, ■■■■■ He ■■■■ charitable and generous to ■ degree, and ■■■■ knew his generosity but the individuals who benefited by it." No ■■■ would ■■■■ cordially have rejoiced at the non-fulfilment of his prophetic forebodings as to the result of the expedition, than this respected old officer, whose eulogium has been so justly pronounced by his grateful friend. His more deliberate impression ■ to the future eminence of that friend, as was likely, had its accomplishment, rendering this tribute to O'Hara's merits ■ memorial worthy of his name.

At the termination of this arduous service, the army of Egypt received the thanks of both Houses of Parliament, and of the Corporation of the City of London, which was communicated to each officer in command of a regiment by Sir John Doyle, in ■ circular couched in very flattering language. General Hutchinson received the order of the Bath, and the entire conduct of the army merited and won the admiration of all men. But the achievements of the expedition were of extreme importance ; the Arabs were astonished at deeds of arms, of which they had not the remotest conception, and still more at the deportment and integrity of the high-minded victors who obtained their confidence, and with it an ample supply of provisions. The glittering Mamelukes ■■■■ again upon the scene, brilliant in costume and marvellous in their feats, and even the dull Fellahs roused themselves into energy under the exciting influence of the soldiers of Great Britain. The sleepy Grand Vizier also, and the Capitan Pacha advanced to meet ■■■ troops ■ friends. Though the army of India, under Major-General Baird, appeared at Jeddah, on the Red Sea, and was joined by a division of infantry and horse from the Cape of Good Hope, their aid not required. The triumph had been won, and Egypt cleared of the invaders, before any union took place between the first army and these forces; and the whole world was taught that Britons knew how to conquer, and how to win respect even from the vanquished, while the uncivilized spectators of their exploits reposed the utmost reliance on their honour, on their strength and their sagacity. Nor were individuals overlooked by the observers of these movements; and it is no slight testimony to Colonel Hill that the presents of the Capitan Pacha, who expressed great regret that he had no worthier offering to make, were the result of the high reputation he had obtained, and the coolness and courage which so fairly won and preserved it.

CHAPTER III.

COLONEL HILL [REDACTED] IN ENGLAND, APRIL 1. 1802. — PÊTE [REDACTED] HAWKSTONE. — LETTER TO MR. WINFIELD. — INCREASE [REDACTED] 90TH. — IRELAND. — COLONEL [REDACTED] MADE [REDACTED] — LEAVES THE 90TH. — [REDACTED] PROCEEDINGS [REDACTED] IRELAND. — ALARMS. — EMPTY CANNON. — THE GALWAY VOLUNTEERS. — PRECAUTIONS AGAINST THE EXPECTED INVASION. — [REDACTED] AND CONSEQUENT MEASURES. — SIGNALS. — MORE ALARMS ABOUT THE FRENCH. — ACTIVITY ON THIS ACCOUNT. — ARRIVALS. — LORD CATHCART'S COMMUNICATION. — RUMOURS AND THEIR CONTRADICTIONS. — VEXATIOUS OBSTACLES. — DISPUTES. — ANOTHER LOOK-OUT FOR THE FRENCH FLEET. — IMPARTIAL CHARACTER OF GENERAL HILL. — HE LEAVES GALWAY. — AMICABLE SOCIETY. — VERIFICATION OF A REMARK OF THE EARL OF HUCHAN.

On the 1st of April, 1802, Colonel Hill, after a voyage in which he encountered several dangerous incidents, found himself comfortably anchored at Spithead, where he "received very pleasant letters from Sir Richard," breathing gratitude in all the writer's fervour for his rising nephew's preservation. They were not released from quarantine till the 6th, when he and his companions trod once more on their native land, [REDACTED] honour to its name. In Colonel Hill's diary, this event is thus marked: — "6th, released from quarantine; went on shore at Portsmouth.

' [REDACTED] has thy bark o'er life's uncertain main,
'Scaped the rough storm and found the [REDACTED] of rest.'

The regiment was landed at Chatham on the 15th of April, and "marched immediately to Chelmsford, where it remained a few months; then proceeded to Scotland, under the impression that it was to be reduced at Fort George, where every necessary arrangement was made for its being disbanded." In the month of June, Colonel Hill visited his relatives in Shropshire, and was received at Hawkstone with the honours due to the high merit which reflected so much lustre on his family. Sir Richard gave a splendid fête in the park, where the magnificent tent of Tippoo Suib, obtained by Colonel Hill in Egypt*, was erected to receive the guests assembled to welcome his return. When his health was given, and the helmet that had so providentially saved his life was handed round, the genuine simplicity of his bearing, and the quiet shrinking of his manner, manifested a disposition so unassuming, that those who saw him could scarcely believe he was the same gallant officer, under whose undaunted leadership the heretofore invincible cavalry of Napoleon had been repelled and vanquished. Display was of all things the least in unison with his nature, retiring in quietude because never ostentatious, active in emergencies because absorbed in fulfilment of duty. His genuine simplicity and urbanity were agreeably evidenced in a letter written to his tutor, Mr. Winfield, during this pleasurable sojourn at Hawkstone:—

"My dear Sir,

"Hawkstone, July 5th.

"I cannot delay a moment returning you my sincere thanks for your kind and affectionate letter, which would have been the greatest pleasure if it had not contained such an indifferent account of yourself; but I trust and hope you will be restored to perfect health.

* From the army returning by the Red Sea from India.

“ Since I have been in various parts of the world, and have had an opportunity of seeing several interesting countries, and must acknowledge I have had providential escapes; but, thank God, I returned to the best country in the world, in health and safety. I imagine the reduction of the 90th regiment will take place. I shall then have time to visit all my old acquaintances, and be assured, my dear Sir, I shall never pass through Chester without calling on you. I beg to be kindly remembered to all your family, and believe me,

“ My dear Sir,

“ Your sincere and obedient

“ R. HILL.

“ Rev. James Winfield, Chester.”

The expectation expressed in this letter was not to be realized, and the reason is thus given in his own words: — “ At the end of 1802 the affairs of Europe were unsettled; rumours of wars made it advisable to increase the army, and the 90th, instead of being reduced, had orders to use every exertion to get men, in consequence of which I sent out various recruiting parties in England and Scotland. I remained with the regiment the greater part of the winter of 1802, and beginning of 1803. In the spring of 1803 we received orders to proceed to Ireland; sailed from Portsmouth, and were quartered at Belfast till August following. During the period we were at Belfast, Ireland was in a very disturbed state. In August we were ordered to march to Ballinasloe. On arrival at Mullingar, I received an official letter informing that I was appointed a Brigadier-General on the staff in Ireland, and to be stationed at Loughrea.” This enemy's fleet being        the coast, in consequence of which the troops        kept in readiness to move        the shortest notice. Reports of this kind, many without foundation, kept        on the alert. General Dalrymple, on the 20th of October, sent        report of the enemy's actual landing        Killala Bay. This report originated from the circumstance of two English frigates coming in to water. Their empty casks were all floated to the shore, and each        considered        boat full of French troops." This imaginary alarm of the Irishmen who        the look-out, is probably without parallel in the category of blunders, and must have afforded infinite amusement at their expense, especially as the report stated "they were landing very fast!" Lord Hardwick        at this time Lord Lieutenant, and General Fox commander of the forces, and General        was        brought into more useful service than attending to summonses to repel incursions of empty water-casks. "About the 10th of November, 1803," he says, "I        ordered to Galway, and arrived two days afterwards at that town, to take the command of the western district. On the 10th of December, made arrangements for the police of the town, which was badly managed. Orders        also given to the commanding officers of corps, to be in readiness to march at the shortest notice. Various orders and regulations for the yeomanry corps, which were in general in        bad [state]. The Light Company of Galway volunteers laid down their arms; and other troops behaved in nearly the        unmilitary        ner." In these difficulties, General Hill manifested the most admirable tact, the result of which        that the Light Company, who acted so disgracefully, confessed their with shame and regret. He considered that his duty to ascertain the of this conduct, and then to deal with them accordingly, in the spirit of that mild but firm dignity which adorned his character and office. His first step, therefore, to order " a Court of Inquiry, comprised of respectable ycomantry captains, to investigate the conduct of the men, and to inquire into the of their complaints." General Hill, considering the affair of great delicacy, submitted their report to the inspection of Sir Eyre Coote, asking either his private advice or official directions. He anxious to heal the matter in a wise and proper manner. His remark to Sir Eyre Coote was, " It appears to that Government have not been regular in their disbursements to the corps in this town; but the conduct of the company in question is not the less reprehensible on that account, which they are indeed fully sensible of, and promise to atone for their past irregularity, by future obedience and observance of discipline. But notwithstanding their present contrition, I have some hesitation in restoring their arms." At the time he ordered two ringleaders into confinement, till Sir Eyre's should arrive. This prudent line of conduct had an admirable effect. On the 1st of January, 1804, he had the pleasure of making a favorable report the state of Ireland, yet, as usual, took merit to himself, but said, " This reformation probably may proceed in some degree from a failure of promise from the French, who it generally believed would visit their friends here six or eight weeks ago, and from the present conviction in the minds of the people of the improbability of an enemy making any strong impression, from the vigilance and activity of Government in the rebellious counties, and from the rigorous military [REDACTED] adopted in the [REDACTED] try." In his [REDACTED] memoranda his proceedings [REDACTED] thus recorded : — " In the beginning of January, 1804, detailed instructions [REDACTED] given to the yeomanry corps for their conduct in the event of the enemy's landing [REDACTED] the coast, which was expected. I also examined all the places [REDACTED] the coast likely for the enemy to land, and visited more than once the wild country of Connemara, which chiefly belongs to Mr. Richard Martin, of Galway. In all these excursions I [REDACTED] accompanied and assisted by my friend and aid-de-camp, Captain Currie." The precautionary [REDACTED] [REDACTED] which were the judicious result of this inspection, will be seen in the following letter, addressed by this officer to Mr. Martin : —

" Sir,

" Galway, 5th Jan. 1804.

" In the absence of Brigadier-General Hill, who [REDACTED] gone to meet Sir Eyre Coote, I am directed to inform you that, in the event of [REDACTED] enemy's effecting [REDACTED] debarkation to the west of the Connemara country, he recommends to your immediate consideration to destroy Tindella Bridge, nine miles to the west of Oughterard; as also to occupy an important hill, three miles west of the last-mentioned place, [REDACTED] which the road runs, and which may be considered as a very strong hold in the hands of [REDACTED] small number, and capable of stopping the progress of [REDACTED] enemy advancing upon that quarter from Galway. There are also three small bridges to the westward of Ballynalinch, which it would be of importance to break up and destroy.

“It is unnecessary to point out to you the impracticability of an enemy’s advancing with artillery, &c., if these precautionary measures are adopted in time. The natural obstacles which the country presents, and the facility with which the road, the only road of approach, may be destroyed, may be obvious to every person possessing your local knowledge of it.

“I have the honour to be, Sir,

“Your most obedient humble Servant,

“E. CURRIE.

“Richd. Martin, Esq., &c. &c. &c.”

General Hill, by various important steps, did effectual service, civil as well as military, in those trying times. His proceedings were little known, because eclipsed by the splendour of his Peninsular glory; but they will be duly appreciated by all who trace the satisfactory gradations of his rise to the highest pinnacle of military honour. At this time, the vigilance he exercised and the plans he adopted commanded great admiration; and one of them was, the raising effective bodies of native Irish, to act under their superiors, as guards of passes. A gentleman of the name of Ireland may be given as the example, and General Hill wrote respecting him in these terms to Sir E. B. Littlehales: “Mr. Ireland is a Protestant, and a very respectable loyal subject; and I conceive a corps of such people of his own persuasion might be enabled to associate together, might be rendered extremely useful in guarding the pass of Cong, and thereby cutting off the communication of the disaffected with the Connemara country.” In order to be prepared in case of necessity, General Hill opened a communication between Loughren and Galway by signal, and how carefully he arranged the necessary preparations, appears from what he wrote on the 15th of January, 1804, to Sir Eyre Coote:—“Captain Trench, Royal Navy, has been employed for 15 days in preparing a dictionary containing every word that could possibly be used. Each word is numbered; and with the ten signals agreed upon he is capable of expressing any number whatever, you will perceive the facility with which the most detailed information may be communicated, and that with the most profound secrecy.” After this, the following account will be read with surprise. “In this month (January) I also established a telegraph between Loughrea and Galway, and had considerable trouble in recovering the expenses incurred on the occasion. I also had a survey of the country made.” This money was advanced out of his private resources; but he bore this conduct on the part of the Government with his usual placidity, and obtained a reimbursement at last, after a long and tiresome correspondence. Towards the end of February, the disloyal portion of the Irish people were firmly persuaded that the French would come, and General Hill’s view of their expectations is thus expressed in a private letter: “I cannot avoid remarking that it is too evident that disaffection has not yet subsided; and although it is not possible for me to speak positively on a subject of so much delicacy, yet I am led to believe that the disaffected, particularly of the middling class, rather begin to show themselves, and look forward with much confidence to the invasion of this country, which they pretend to say will take place in the course of this month." The instructions from the Lord Lieutenant were to keep a vigilant watch, and to communicate all the information that could be acquired. He had scarcely received these injunctions, when an intimation was conveyed to him that "the country was laid out in departments, and commissioners of various ranks assigned to fill those departments," and also that the French would probably land in two or three places, and the conflict be very sanguinary. The precautionary measures he took in consequence of this information, to which he attached some credit, were extensive and decided. He issued a circular of private instruction to the captains of yeomanry, so to dispose of the boats on Lough Carib that they could not be available to an enemy, and himself paid a visit of inspection to the isles of Arran, as being "particularly well situated for a look-out post on the western coast." He likewise issued orders how to deal with those who appeared disposed to welcome the invaders; and having still in remembrance the empty-cask bugbear, gave instructions to prevent false alarms. In these laudable measures General Hill was cordially assisted by the well-disposed Irish of all grades and persuasions, while the Athlone militia tendered their services in any way, and in any place in the United Kingdom, that might be deemed expedient; and there was there the slightest apprehension to apprehend that attempts made to tamper with the yeomanry would be of any avail, as well were they organized and disposed. The result was, that on the 9th of May he was enabled to report to the Lord Lieutenant that "nothing had occurred in the district under his command to interrupt the public tranquillity;" and further, on the 1st of June, "the country is perfectly quiet, and I have no reason to think that there ■ any improper meetings held." The same also was stated in his official communications in July. But General Hill ■ not inactive; he ■ engaged ■ ■ important work. His ■ account states, "in the summer I ■ employed by Government to build towers for signals on the coast. This duty gave ■ considerable trouble and anxiety, which ■ greatly increased by the irregular ■ in which Government made their payments." This irregularity embraced every department, and ■ the subject of harassing correspondence, especially on behalf of the arrears due to the yeomanry, in which General Hill was warmly supported by General Pigot, who had taken the command of the western district. Lord Cathcart was commander of the forces; and on the 9th of August General ■ received from him the subjoined secret communication relative to the long anticipated arrival of the French, who ■ again ■ pected of an attempt to land in Ireland:—

"Camp, Carragh of Kildare, 9th August, **■

"Dear General Hill,

"There is ■ tolerably well-grounded report that nine sail of the French fleet have got out of Brest, destination said to be the Mediterranean, but of course that is quite uncertain.

"We must keep ■ good look-out.

"Any report to me will be forwarded either by the Secretary's office or Adjutant General's office, Royal Hospital, if I am not there.

"Yours, dear General, truly and faithfully,

"CATHCART."

This, however, altogether a false alarm, for two days afterwards he received another letter on the subject from General Pigot in contradiction of the report.

“ My dear Sir, . . . “ Ballinacloe, August 11. [ ]

“ I have received a letter from Colonel Anstruther, informing me that Government have received advice that the report of a French squadron having escaped from Brest is unfounded. The whole of the French fleet in Brest harbour remained the third, in the state in which they have been for time past.

“ Believe [ ]

“ Most truly yours,

“ H. PIGOT.

“ P. S. Be good to inform Captain Trench of this, and make it known where you may think necessary.”

Thus, between alarms and their contradictions, General Hill was at this time kept in a state by no means enviable, while his patience was tried to the utmost by obstacles of the most reprehensible kind, raised by proprietors to the erection of the signals their properties, which became a source of great annoyance to him. He all these difficulties with the most praiseworthy forbearance, and manifested infinite tact and kindness in settling certain disputes between Irish officers of yeomanry, commencing in bluster and ending in mutual apologies made under his directions, who never in his life to have had a dispute with any Besides these unpleasant circumstances, he had to submit to a continual change of aids-de-camp. His own narrative of events this time makes mention of these circumstances. “ I was,” he says, “ deprived of the services of Captain Currie, in consequence of the embarkation of the 90th Regiment to the West Indies. On November 17th Brigade-Major Foster repaired to Galway, for the purpose of being attached to ■■■ in the situation held by Captain Currie ■■■ Brigade-Major. In the early part of this year (1805), I ■■■ chiefly occupied at Galway in the erection of Naval Signal Posts. Mr. ———'s opposition to the erecting ■ post near his house in Connemara, was most reprehensible and troublesome to me. On the 26th January I received ■ letter from the Adjutant-General, informing ■■■ that ■ large ship full of troops had been seen off the coast of Scotland, and desiring ■■■ to take every possible precaution." As usual nothing came of this announcement, while General Hill was obliged to write thus to head-quarters: — "I have to request that his Lordship will be pleased to recommend the payment of the money advanced by me upwards of ■ year since." This letter was crossed by ■■■ of an official character to the effect described by himself. "On the 25th of April I received a letter from head-quarters informing ■■■ that a large French fleet with troops on board had been ■■■■ Gibraltar, and desiring ■■■ to keep ■ good look-out." Then came another change of aid-de-camp. "On the 14th of May, Brigade-Major Foster, who ■■■ afterwards killed in action, ■■■ ordered to join his regiment. He was, at my request, replaced by Captain Palmer of the 15th Foot." At the same time General Hill wrote to Sir Eyre Coote, under whom Major Foster was about to serve, recommending him to his friendly attention ■■■ having been "unremitting in his duty ■ an officer, and circumspect in his behaviour ■ ■ gentleman."

He manifested in ■ his recommendations the same impartial patronage of merit, and merit alone, which enabled him when at the head of the army to repel every insinuation of political opponents. An officer applied to him, while in Ireland, on the score of relationship, for a vacant company, alleging at the ■ time that several officers junior to himself had received this promotion. His ■ was, "Although it is my wish to serve every deserving officer, and particularly those I have the honour of being related to, yet, in your case, I ■ sorry I do not feel myself warranted to recommend you for promotion, ■ I could only do it on the plea of your merit, with which I am not acquainted." He then added, that he had never ■ him as a soldier, and that if his pretensions were just, his own commanding-officer would not overlook them.

In October, 1805, General Hill joined the camp on the Curragh of Kildare, with which he remained till it broke up, and then returned to Galway, after which he finally departed from that town, to the great regret of the inhabitants, who ■ unanimous in presenting him a most gratifying and justly-merited address.

This address, and General Hill's reply, were published in the Dublin Post and Connaught Journal.

The Amicable Society, of which he had been elected President in the month of November, 1804, enrolled him in the list of their honorary members, and addressed to him ■ most touching farewell. Under his influence, they said they had "experienced all the advantages of the strictest military discipline, without any of its austerities." Thus General Hill quitted the district in which he had commanded, leaving the impression which a tender heart, a most courteous bearing, and a firm hand could not fail to make in the well-disposed of all ranks.

The Earl of Buchan, who first met him in Scotland in 1792, remarked in a letter to Sir Richard Hill, "By all the rules of Lavater, as well as my own, I should have augured well of that young gentleman from his appearance and manner." The favourable impression made upon every individual, of whatever grade, who had the good fortune to have intercourse with him, while experience more than confirmed the highest expectations.

CHAPTER IV.

LETTERS OF THE DUKE OF LORD CATHCART. — ARRIVAL TO THE WEST. —
 CHRISTMAS-DAY, 1805. — GENERAL HILL'S FIRST INTERVIEW WITH SIR ARTHUR WELLESLEY. — THE BATTLE OF THE WESER. —
 PILOT'S BARGE AT YARMOUTH. — DEATH OF GENERAL HILL'S WIFE. — BURIAL ON CLIFF. — SIR HILL
 GENERAL. — IRELAND AGAIN. — REMAINS STAY TILL [REDACTED] IN [REDACTED] TO [REDACTED] SIR ARTHUR WELLESLEY. — FIRST [REDACTED] CAMPAIGN. — PREPARATIONS. — CORRESPONDENCE. — DEPARTURE.
 — VOYAGE. — LANDING IN MONDEGO BAY. — NEW [REDACTED]
 — [REDACTED] BEARING OF SIR ARTHUR WELLESLEY. — [REDACTED] INSTRU-TIONS [REDACTED] THE [REDACTED] OF [REDACTED] TROOPS [REDACTED] THE CON-TINENT. — BATTLE OF BOLIÇA. — BATTLE [REDACTED] VINEIRO. — CONVEN-TION. — SIR [REDACTED] MOORE. — HIS CAMPAIGN. — BATTLE OF CORUÑA.
 — GENERAL HILL BRINGS HOME [REDACTED] TO PLYMOUTH. — [REDACTED]
 OF THE INHABITANTS. — DEATH OF SIR RICHARD HILL. — GE-NERAL HILL APPOINTED TO [REDACTED] BATTALION. —
 SENT TO PORTUGAL. — ANXIOUSLY EXPECTED [REDACTED] J. CRADOCK. — LETTER OF [REDACTED] J. CRADOCK. — SIR ARTHUR WELLESLEY ARRIVES AT LISBON.

THE [REDACTED] of General Hill's departure from Galway will be [REDACTED] in a letter addressed to Lord Cathcart, by his Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief.

" My Lord,

" Horse Guards, Oct. 19. 1805.

" Having caused it to be intimated to your Lordship that a force of 5000 [REDACTED] would be immediately ordered to embark from Cork for this country, in consequence of the intention of Government to send a considerable force from hence to the continent, I have now to desire that your Lordship may be pleased to direct the undermentioned regiments to be immediately embarked on board of such transports as have been provided for their reception, and to sail for England with the [REDACTED] fair wind. The regiments will take with them respectively their battalion guns, camp equipage, and [REDACTED] much spare ammunition [REDACTED] will complete them, if possible, to 300 rounds per gun, and 300 rounds per man.

“As it is very probable that the Middleton transport which was ordered to proceed with Sir Eyre Coote to Jamaica, with camp equipage and medical stores for [REDACTED] men, may yet be [REDACTED] Cork, your Lordship will be pleased to [REDACTED] her to be detained, and [REDACTED] return to England with the regiments hereafter mentioned.

“The battalions to be embarked [REDACTED] [REDACTED] follows; viz. 1st battalion, [REDACTED] regiment, ditto 9th, ditto 28th, ditto 30th, ditto 36th, ditto 89th.

“The General Officer whom your Lordship will be pleased to embark with the above force, will be Brigadier General Rowland Hill, and the whole to be placed for the present under the command of that Brigadier General.

“I am, my Lord,

“Yours,

“FREDERICK,

“Commander-in-Chief.”

In consequence of this letter, Lord Cathcart addressed the subjoined friendly notice to General Hill:—

— Royal Hospital, Oct. 21. 1805.

“My dear General Hill,

“I have directed the Adjutant-General to forward to you by express, the copy of [REDACTED] letter which I have this day received from his Royal Highness, the Commander-in-Chief. You will, therefore, be pleased to report by express to Lieutenant-General Lord Rosslyn, and to acquaint Brigadier-General Stuart, [REDACTED] Cork, and the officers commanding [REDACTED] Ballinasloe and [REDACTED] Loughrea, as well as at Athlone, of your motions, and proceed as expeditiously as you can to Cork, in order to superintend the embarkation of the troops.

“There being no battalion guns on this establishment, there is considerable difficulty in supplying the demand on that subject. If, however, I can muster twelve guns, they will be prepared at Cork, and due attention shall also be paid to the stowage of the spare gun and musket ammunition on the transport.

"I have to request that you will give to Brigadier-General Stuart what information you can in regard to Galway, as he will probably, for the present, command there; but you must not delay your departure on any account relating to the service here, as you are entrusted with a command, by order of the Commander-in-Chief.

"I will use my best endeavours to procure for you the price of your map.

"I am myself under orders for departure, having received a notification that I am appointed ambassador to the Emperor* of Russia; but I have not yet instructions relative to making over the command here, and I do not expect to leave this place before the middle of the week.

"Wherever you may go, my dear General, you will carry with you my sincere regard, and you will be followed by my best wishes for your health, honour, and happiness; and I beg to assure you of the grateful sense I shall always entertain of your active assistance and attentions since I have been in this command, and of the very great regard with which I remain,

"My dear General,

"Your faithful and obedient Servant,

"CATHCART.

"P.S. The ladies of my family send you their compliments and best wishes."

I have inserted these letters as evidences of the just impression made in the highest quarters, as well as on the inhabitants of his district, by the military talent and private demeanour of General Hill in Ireland. The map alluded to by Lord Cathcart, was a survey he had caused to be made according to instructions; and though he had advanced a considerable sum in payment for it, he could not obtain a reimbursement, and was obliged to memorialize the Commander of the Forces on the subject.

* Lord Cathcart did not go to Russia, but to the West.

General Hill lost some time in proceeding to Cork according to order. His own memorandum contains the following notice of events at this exciting period. "On the 30th of October Lord Cathcart, as Commander of the Forces, took leave of the army, being ordered to his service. The armies on the continent at this period were in active operation. Bonaparte crossed the Danube. The capitulation of Ulm was signed by General Mack, and not a vestige of the Austrian force was left in Suabia. This armament from Ireland and England was hurried to the Weser, with the view of assisting the Continental powers to check the rapid success of the French.—21st of October: Lord Nelson's victory off Trafalgar.—In the early part of December the great armies of the Continent were engaged near Olmutz. The uncertain accounts of these operations which came to England, induced Mr. Pitt to risk every thing to send troops to the Continent, and notwithstanding the season of the year, and the dangers of the North Seas, we were ordered to proceed. After a tremendous passage, and serious losses, some of us had the good fortune to arrive in the Weser on Christmas Day, 1805." And a miserable Christmas it was, clouded with disasters and ill-tidings. "When I reached that river," says General Hill, "the head-quarter ship of every regiment belonging to us was missing; some were wrecked on the Dutch coast, and many souls perished on the Goodwin Sands." No sooner had the General and lively aid-de-camp, Captain Peebles, stepped on shore, than they were met by an old sugar-refiner who had resided in England, who told them, in the most grotesque attempt to speak their native language, of the triumphs of the armies of Napoleon. Such was the unhappy Christmas of 1805; but General Hill had consolation, that of having made the acquaintance, on his way from Cork, of the illustrious leader destined by Providence to be the conqueror of Europe's scourge and England's enemy, who had as yet to learn that a nation whom God protected was invincible by land and she triumphant by sea. "On our voyage from Cork," he says, "we put into Falmouth, where we remained about a week. General Houghton was under my orders in command of his regiment. We also anchored off Deal, where I first saw Sir Arthur Wellesley. He dined with me at my lodgings at Mrs. Chitty's, and was much amused with Captain Peebles. Sir Arthur took the command of the troops collecting for the Weser."* General Hill modestly leaves unnoticed

* This expedition was fitted out under the command of Lord Cathcart, and Major-General Arthur Wellesley commanded a brigade in it, on the occasion General Hill served with him. On the arrival of the tidings of the battle of Austerlitz, they were recalled, and the troops placed on our own coast for defence in case of an invasion. Sir Arthur Wellesley commanded a brigade at Hastings this, and General Hill at Hythe, whence he was the staff in Ireland. It was in allusion to Sir Arthur's being only in command of a brigade in the Weser expedition, that the true patriot soldier said, "I am nammukwallah, as they say in India; I have the king's salt, and therefore ready to serve my king in any capacity." These memorable words, which have indeed been proved to be sincere by the whole of the Duke of Wellington's life, spent in willing devotedness to his sovereign and country, are out of the impression he made on the sagacious mind of that illustrious man, an impression which became more and more confirmed in each succeeding year of intercourse in war and in peace, and which evinced under every possible modification that could exhibit admiration, gratitude, and confidence, as worthy of the breast whence they sprung of the noble spirit towards which they were directed.

The great successes of the French in 1805 caused the return of the forces with which General Hill had gone to the Weser, and at the end of January, 1806, he found himself once more at Deal. On his voyage to that port he anchored off Yarmouth, and it was natural, the first question asked of the pilot was, "What news?" His reply was truly in accordance with the quaint ignorance and roughness of his class in those days, "Billy Pitt is dead, and Charley Fox come into Parliament." "This news," General Hill says, "we soon found to be true. Pitt died on the 24th of January, aged 48, and Fox was placed at the head of the Government. Bonaparte at this time was triumphant over all the armies of the confederates. These calamities deeply affected Mr. Pitt, and it was supposed that the successes of the French at Austerlitz had hastened his death." From Yarmouth this small British force proceeded to Deal and thence to Ramsgate, where General Hill received the melancholy tidings of the death of his mother. This event happening at a period when, for the first and last time, he had just back from foreign service without distinction, tried to the utmost his calm and resigned spirit; but he who received his laurels with meekness, knew how to submit the cypress with submission to the will of Him, who gives and takes away according to the wisdom of his supreme and gracious Providence.

He thus announces his next movement: — “On the 17th of April I arrived at Brabone Lees to take the command of the troops in that neighbourhood, establishing my quarters at a small house between Brabone Lees and Hythe. Lord Moira was appointed to the command of the Southern district on the 15th of April, 1806. Sir John Moore was stationed at Canterbury, and I was directed to report to him until the 5th of June, when he and General Mackenzie Frazer were removed to the staff of the army serving in the Mediterranean, when Sir George Ludlow was appointed to the command at Canterbury. On the 23d of June, my brigade, consisting of the 9th, 45th, and 62d, marched and encamped at Shorn Cliff. I encamped with the troops on a beautiful spot immediately above the Rev. Mr. Brockman’s house.” There he lived a true soldier’s life under canvas, and produced by his exertions and example such perfection in the brigade, that the highest commendations were passed on it by Lord Moira and the Duke of York in two successive inspections. He had previously been advanced to the rank of Major-General, and was now appointed to the staff; and his brother, Captain Thomas Noel Hill, became his aid-de-camp. In October they went into cantonments, and remained at Hythe till the end of December, when they were ordered to Ireland. Before their departure General Hill had the satisfaction of receiving a flattering communication from the mayor, to which he replied with his usual courtesy.

He next went to Ireland, where he remained the whole of the year 1807. The Duke of Bedford Lord-Lieutenant, and Lieutenant-Colonel Stewart Chief Secretary and Military Secretary, to whom General Hill's principal communications of official character were addressed. His routine of duty very similar to that assigned him before the expedition to the Weser, except that he had not to deal with alarms of French invasion. He stationed at Fermoy, and the chief objects of his attention appear to have been the suppression of local disturbances, and precautionary measures against handitti infesting the mountains, in both of which he was eminently successful. Every thing reported to the Vice-Regal Court and the Commander of the Forces, was carefully sifted by him and represented in its proper light, which occasioned considerable trouble, for the slightest insubordination, even a disturbance on a market day, a quarrel about leases and lands, construed by the vivid imagination of his reporters into insurrection and hostility to Government. He managed to quiet all these false alarms, and allayed private animosities between the officers, he did during his previous residence amongst the sensitive people he had to deal with. In this way he proceeded to the admiration of all parties, till, in the year 1808, he was ordered to join the then Chief Secretary of Ireland, Sir Arthur Wellesley, on his first campaign in the Peninsula, where his military talents had full scope for their exercise, in a series of achievements equally honourable to himself and viceable to his country. Happily for General Hill, with a change of government there arose a change of projects, he might have been sent on the proposed Quixotic expedition to Spanish South America, instead of going to reap victory and honor on the fields of Europe. The ministers who succeeded "the talents" had the ~~honour~~ ~~to~~ relinquish this scheme; and guided principally by the advice of the deputies who had arrived in England from the Asturias and Galicia, they bade adieu to the projects of the adventurer Miranda, and changed the destination of the troops in Ireland from South America to Portugal, appointing Sir Arthur Wellesley to command them. These troops, amounting to about 9000 men, formed at that time the most disposable army of this country, whose soldiers and treasure had been alike scattered without judgment. Sir Arthur Wellesley soon opened his correspondence with General Hill, respecting the brigading and embarkation of the forces. In his first letter * ~~on~~ these subjects, dated "Dublin Castle, 28d June, 1808," he says, "My dear Hill, I rejoice extremely at the prospect ~~of~~ ~~of~~ have before ~~me~~ of serving again with you, and I hope we shall have more to do than ~~we~~ had ~~at~~ the last occasion ~~on~~ which ~~we~~ ~~are~~ together." After giving him the necessary instructions, Sir Arthur added, "You may readily believe

* ~~The~~ principal part of the letters which passed between the Duke ~~of~~ Wellington ~~and~~ Lord Hill, during the Peninsular War, have ~~been~~ already published by ~~Mr~~ Gurwood. ~~The~~ ~~originals~~, written by the former, ~~are~~ Lord Hill's own copies of the latter, ~~and~~ ~~in~~ my possession, ~~and~~ ~~of~~ them I have ~~been~~ such ~~copies~~ ~~as~~ I have thought ~~it~~ expedient ~~to~~ introduce into the present volume.

that I have plenty to do in closing up ■ government in such a manner ■ that I may give it up, and taking the command of ■ corps for service; but I shall not fail to attend to whatever you may write to me." Nor did General Hill fail to attend to every particular of the directions he received from Sir Arthur Wellesley, relating to the embarkation of the troops on board the transports in which they were to sail. The most anxious ■ ■ ■ taken of their health and comforts, and the men ■ ■ ■ occasionally ordered on shore for air and exercise. Sir Arthur prepared for sailing with his usual promptitude, and on the receipt of his instructions, wrote to this effect: —

"My dear Hill,

"Dublin Castle, July 3d, 1808.

"I have received my instructions, and I understand that the cavalry and some ships to receive the 36th and 45th regiments sailed from the Downs and Portsmouth on the 30th. I shall be at Cork on Wednesday, and I hope that we shall sail immediately afterwards. The horses of the Commissariat will be ■ Cork ■ Tuesday and Wednesday, and I shall be obliged to you if you will arrange with General Floyd respecting the early embarkation.

"I would have taken horses of the Artillery ■ I could have got them; but, alas! I could not, and have therefore those which will probably only do ■ work till ■ shall get others.

"I have written Malcolm ■ long letter respecting the arrangement of the transports into divisions; ■ code of signals for the army; and return of transports and flat-bottomed boats; so that ■ may make ■ our arrangements for landing while ■ ■ ■ be on the passage. He will probably speak to you ■ these subjects, and I ■ ■ be obliged to you if you will give him all the assistance and information in your power.

“Tell Arbuthnot that I have desired my groom ■ apply to him for orders when he ■ arrive ■ Cork; and that I shall be obliged to him if he will have the horses embarked in the transport allotted to the staff horses. He had better send up to Cork to one of the officers of General Floyd's staff, to desire that the horses may be forwarded to Cove when they will arrive.

“ Ever yours most sincerely,

“ ARTHUR WELLESLEY.

“ Major-General Hill.”

Sir Arthur's instructions were dated the 30th of June; and on the 6th of July he arrived at Cork, where he was delayed longer than he expected, and became anxious to go in some small separate vessel to Coruña. He however sailed with the troops on the 12th; but on the 13th quitted the fleet, and went on board the Crocodile, commanded by the Honourable G. Cadogan, in which he arrived at Coruña on the 20th. The exact number of the rank and file who embarked at Cove was 9505, besides 215 horses, staff, field officers, 550 serjeants, and 227 drummers, which appears to ■ civilian ■ goodly allowance; but they ■ going against the French, who out-drum every other nation upon earth. The voyage proceeded prosperously, and progress ■ thus announced by General Hill to Lord Castlereagh:—

“ Lat. 48° 40', Long. 9° W.

“ My Lord,

“ H. ■ ■ Donegal, 18th July, 1808.

“ In the absence of Lieutenant-General ■ Arthur Wellesley. it affords ■ particular satisfaction to inform your Lordship by the La Gloria, that none of the transports that sailed with the armament from Cove on the 12th of this month are missing, and that the troops are perfectly healthy. Sir Arthur Wellesley went on board the Crocodile on the 13th, and in the evening proceeded for his destination.

“ I have, &c.

“ R. HILL.

“ Viscount Castlereagh.”

After various events irrelevant to this memoir, having no connection with General Hill, Sir Arthur Wellesley on board the Donegal, the 30th of July, and began to land the troops in Mondego Bay on the 1st of August under admirable regulations. The operations occupied till the 5th, when reinforcement under General Spencer arrived, by which however the number of troops only augmented to 12,800 men. Before he commenced disembarking the armament, Sir Arthur Wellesley had been apprised of the arrangements for the future command of the several corps that the Government had determined should form one army in Portugal, under the new commander of the forces, Sir Hew Dalrymple, with Sir Harry Burrard as the second in command. His own great stood last in the list of lieutenant-generals in this programme of service, under these mortifying circumstances did his noble disposition fail full manifestation. “ All,” he wrote to Lord Castlereagh, “ I say the subject is, that whether I to command the army or not, to quit it, I shall do my best to ensure its success; and you may depend upon it that I shall not hurry the operations commence than one moment than they ought to be commenced, in order that I may acquire the credit of the success.” He went issuing orders from Lavaos with that comprehensiveness of judgment which has been surpassed by any in a situation, until the approach of the hostile armies to each other indicated the necessity of instructions in of a conflict. On the 9th he enclosed to General Hill a copy of orders given to General Fane through Colonel Bathurst, Lieutenant-Colonel and Deputy Quartermaster-General. On the original General Hill wrote the following memorandum: — "Sir Arthur Wellesley's instructions for the first movement that made by his troops on the Continent." It is follows: —

" Sir, " Head-quarters, Lavaos, 8th August, 1808.

" I directed by Lieut.-General Sir Arthur Wellesley to desire that you will be pleased to march to-morrow ing, at three o'clock, towards Leyria, and take post in front of Gão. Captain Douglas, Assistant Quartermaster-General, will point out the ground.

" Captain Gomm will attend the column from the camp, to show the road. In the evening you will be pleased to push forwards dragoons, with a detachment of infantry, as far as you may judge expedient; and should you receive intelligence that the enemy not Leyria, in the neighbourhood, you will the town of Leyria to be occupied by this detachment either to-morrow evening or on Wednesday morning.

" Should you find that the enemy are in any force or in the neighbourhood of Leyria, you will withdraw the detachment, and remain in front of Gão, until you receive orders from Sir Arthur Wellesley, to whom you will transmit the earliest intelligence you may obtain. You will be pleased to cause a detachment to remain in camp, to deliver over the equipage of the 60th Regiments to the store-keeper, who will be on the ground three o'clock A.M. to receive it.

"The tents are to be packed up in bales ready for embarkation, with the number on each bale on the outside, and they are to be packed on the waggons by the detachments of the regiments.

"An Assistant Commissary will attend the brigade to supply provisions, and he will also make every inquiry respecting the resources the enemy may be likely to find at Leyria, and you will be pleased to give him any assistance he may require to execute this duty.

"I have the honour to be, Sir,

"Your most obedient humble Servant,

"JAMES BATHURST,

"Lieut.-Col. and Deputy Quart.-Mast.-General."

The next day General Hill informed in a letter from Sir Arthur Wellesley, that having heard that the enemy might possibly be in some strength at Leyria, he had desired General Fane to wait for his brigade and the brigade of General Ferguson, all of which were to halt at St. Gião till Sir Arthur himself should join them at five or six o'clock in the morning, if the enemy were in possession of Leyria. If not, he was to endeavour to feel his way into the town with two hundred riflemen and a few dragoons, and the next day to take up his position in front of the place. Leyria entered, the enemy occupying Alcobça, about sixteen miles distant, under Generals Laborde and Thomiere, and Santarem on the high road to Lisbon, where Junot and Loison established. It is not my province to describe the plans, movements, and difficulties of Sir Arthur Wellesley at this moment, nor the conduct of the Portuguese General, Bernardim Freire, nor that of the ambitious meddling bishop of Oporto, who had assumed a character and displayed a spirit so contrary to that of his office as described by St. Paul—but to conduct the reader at once to the first action in which the subject of these pages gained Peninsular laurels under his unrivalled leader. General Laborde, pressed by Sir Arthur Wellesley, had moved from his previous position to a small plain in front of the village of Roliça, with the advantage of an elevation enabling him to overlook the whole country as far as Obidos. Here it was determined to attack him on the 17th of August; and General Hill's brigade formed a portion of the central column commanded by Sir Arthur in person. After the repulse occasioned by the first attack, in which General Hill displayed the most eminent activity and skill, Laborde retired into a formidable position in the mountains, full of passes difficult of access, where he assumed, with consummate dexterity, an attitude of apparently impregnable defence. Generals Hill and Nightingale advanced against this well-guarded front, approachable only by defiles where Nature had placed every conceivable obstacle of wood, rock, and ravine, which seemed to render the steep ascent almost impossible to achieve by columns, whom the rugged paths could not fail to throw into disorder. But the generals pushed on undismayed by the difficulties of the passes, or the stern resolution of the enemy. The mountain-hollows were heard to ring with the echoing roll of musketry, mingled with the war-shouts of the assailants and the still louder responses of the assailed. Laborde was driven from his stronghold with a considerable loss of men, and with that also of three pieces of cannon ; but, owing to a want of cavalry on the side of the British, effected his march in good order. On this occasion General Hill received the highest commendations ; and it may be added, that the conduct of all the troops engaged, in number by no means equal to that of the enemy, was worthy of the British name, and of the manner in which they fought.

At the celebrated battle of Vimeiro, on the 21st of August, the brigade of General Hill was posted on a mountain at the back of the village, as a reserve to the whole army ; and if Sir Harry Burrard, who landed during the action, had agreed to Sir Arthur Wellesley's proposal, he would have moved upon Torres Vedras to the right, while the victorious left pursued the advantages they had gained, and, in the opinion of Sir Arthur, would have ensured the entrance of the British into Lisbon before the French, if, indeed, the whole opposing army had not been annihilated. But the decision of Sir Harry, who, in the moment of Wellesley's triumph, assumed the command, was against all movement from Vimeiro, so that nothing remained for the victors but to dine with what appetite they could, under the conviction that they had been deprived of the glory of the consummation of their success, which, confiding in the genius of their superseded leader, few would doubt they would have achieved. As it was, Sir Harry determined to wait at Vimeiro till re-enforcements should arrive under Sir John Moore, and the French made good their retreat to Torres Vedras. The command of Sir Arthur Wellesley end, to the regret of every officer who served with him, evinced by a splendid testimonial. He arrived in London the 6th of October, where the affair of Vimeiro, and the armistice and convention succeeding it, became the subjects of a court of inquiry, followed by the thanks to Sir Arthur of both Houses of Parliament, and his return to his duties of Secretary of Ireland. But the history of these circumstances belongs not to this memoir, General Hill remained with the army.

In pursuance of the stipulations of the convention just alluded to, commonly but erroneously called the Convention of Cintra, Junot's army left Portugal in British vessels, and landed at La Rochelle in the month of October. Sir John Moore appointed to the command of the British forces; Sir David Baird, with a large body of troops, arrived at Coruña; Bonaparte appeared in Spain; Madrid was once occupied by the French; the usurper Joseph tenanted the palace of Saint Ildefonso; and Moore essayed his arduous and memorable movements in the North of Spain, during which Napoleon, alarmed at the demonstrations of Austria, departed, leaving Soult to encounter the English General, whose chief embarrassments arose from the inertness of the Spaniards and the undisciplined troops of Romana. General Hill, like the rest, was subject to the fluctuations of this trying campaign, the movements of which of necessity uncertain, from the peculiarities of their situation. An example of this is afforded by the following instructions from Sir John Hope:—

"Dear Sir,

"Torricella, 14th December,

"Circumstances have occurred which cause a change in movements to-morrow. I enclose the proposed disposition of the right of the army on the 15th and 16th, in consequence of which you will be pleased to march with your brigade to Castro Nuño, on or near the Douro, and the 16th to Toro.

"I remain, dear Sir,

"Yours sincerely,

"JOHN HOPE.

"Major-General Hill."

These changes due to intercepted despatch from Berthier to Soult, which proved that the French were ignorant of the British movements, and inspired Sir John Moore with hope that he might surprise and beat him before Bonaparte could to his assistance. The French Emperor himself was astonished at the boldness of the British movements, and pronounced Moore the only general fit to contend with him, for he could neither surprise him into error, with all his energetic speed overtake him in his masterly retreat; that he departed for his capital foiled in his designs, Soult was when he pursued Sir John through Galicia, with the vain expectation that superiority in numbers would prevent the embarkation of the British army at Coruña. Under the guidance of this patient and sagacious leader troops, after trials often described but never exaggerated, arrived within sight of the the 13th of January, short of provisions, but supported by the expectation of finding transports in the harbour of Coruña, in which they might be embarked in security; but a few small craft were all that appeared in view.

Contrary winds had detained the transports at Vigo, and the French army, in larger numbers than own, rapidly advancing: but the mind of Sir John Moore expanded under the pressure of these adverse circumstances, and his measures were taken with prudence and decision. He first secured his sick on board the few small vessels at hand, put his wearied soldiers into quarters in the town, fortified its weak defences, and determined to effect his embarkation by the repulse of his pursuers. Fortunately, a magazine of English arms was in the town, which were exchanged for the battered muskets of the late campaign; but two storehouses of gunpowder, at some distance from each other, containing more than four thousand barrels, had been placed three miles off Coruña, and in danger of being captured by the enemy. To prevent this it was unhesitatingly resolved to explode them. The train first reached the smaller store, and the town shook with the strong concussion; but scarcely had the larger taken fire when the result was like the eruption of a volcano, in the trembling of the earth, the bursting of the rocks, the upheaving of smoke, dust, stones, and sparks into the air, and the agitated foaming of the disturbed waters of the sea, followed by a shower of white ashes that seemed to descend from the clouds. Both armies, the secret being confided to one officer alone, were confounded: but the panic subsided, and the preparations for the fray proceeded; and the English troops, cheered by the arrival of the transports, were in high spirits, while their leader rejected with disdain a proposal to negotiate upon terms for leave to withdraw to them. He would have retired without bloodshed if possible, ■■■ would hear of ■■ compromise, no convention. On ■■ morning of the 16th he had removed all encumbrances to the ships, and ■■■ prepared to embark under ■■■ of the shades of evening; but at noon the enemy attacked, and he ■■■ the victory of Coruña, ■■ the price of his own life. The valour of those he commanded, the heroism of his lofty spirit, the awful nature of his wound, his death, his burial, his triumph, have been recounted by ■■■■ historians, and will ■■■ be remembered; though ■■ trust the spirit of the Gospel will ■■ pervade the earth, that ■ repetition of his departing words, "I always wished to die thus," may become impossible. To the brigade of General Hill ■■■ assigned the office of protecting the British army ■■ it proceeded to the ships, ■■ the close of the engagement; and when the exhausted soldiers had ceased to file down from the field, feeble ■■ the moon's wan beams ■■ that chill and misty night, he himself went ■■ board, and sailed for the shores of England. He reached Plymouth with ■ portion of the suffering troops towards the end of January, where they ■■■ received with extreme kindness and humanity, the inhabitants paying the utmost attention to their wants, and making liberal subscriptions to supply them.

The people of Plymouth and General Hill were most happily united in these acts of philanthropy towards the soldiers on this trying occasion.*

* In 1812, after the brilliant ■■ that body; ■■■ ■■ Mayor, ■■■ ■■ Almaraz, the corporation George Bellamy, Esq., ■■■ of Plymouth voted ■■■ the freedom ■■■■ ■■■■ announcing the tidings, ■■■■ ■■■■

During the whole of the retreat of Sir John Moore General Hill's exertions were of the most valuable service; and he stood high in the estimation of that distinguished man, who assured him, in a letter on private business, of the great interest he took in his welfare. On the inhabitants of Plymouth his humanity and kindness to the distressed soldiers made a lasting impression; while the troops under his command looked to him as a father. During his absence on the expedition in Spain he lost his esteemed uncle, Sir Richard Hill; his father succeeded to the title and estates of Hawkstone; and he himself became possessed of the property at Hardwick Grange, bequeathed to him by Sir Richard, which he occupied as his favourite residence to the end of his life, breathing his last within its walls.

He had scarcely arrived in his native land before he found himself promoted to the Colonelcy of the Third Garrison Battalion; nor long before he was again ordered by the Commander-in-Chief to prepare for further service. By a letter from His Royal Highness the Duke of York, dated 17th February, 1809, it appears that he was appointed to take the command of the regiments then about to embark at Cork for the Peninsula.

He allowed himself only a few days of repose with his family in Shropshire, and proceeded at once to act remarks: "When you were employed in the Committee of Inhabited Plymouth, I, in the midst of thousands, silently admired you, and your troops, their wives and children, had a greater opportunity of being landed here than Coruña." many of so doing, as I am con-

the instructions of Lord Castlereagh, conveyed to him in these terms:—

“ Sir,

“ Downing Street, 12th March, 1809

“ I am to convey to you the King's commands, that, so soon as the troops placed under your orders are embarked and ready for sea, you do proceed without loss of time to the Tagua, there to place yourself under the orders of Lieutenant-General Sir John Cradock, Commander-in-Chief of His Majesty's forces in Portugal.

“ Three hundred artillery-horses are to accompany your corps. The necessary proportion of artillery-men and guns have already been forwarded from hence to Portugal.

“ I am, Sir,

“ Your most obedient and humble servant,

“ CASTLEREAGH.

“ Major-General Hill, &c. &c., Cork.”

General Hill's arrival in Portugal was anxiously looked for by Sir John Cradock, who had resolved to make no advance till he came, and was surrounded on all sides by difficulties created by the alarming spirit manifested by the troops and people, as well as by the chance of a decisive movement on the part of Victor and Lapisse, likely to be fraught with disastrous consequences. Marshal Beresford was also much relieved by the presence of these reinforcements, and urged Sir John Cradock to move forward.

Sir John's own intentions, and the duties he imposed on General Hill, will be seen in the subjoined communication from the former:—

“ Dear Sir,

“ Leynia, April 22. 1809.

“ In sending forward the corps under your command, I beg to explain to you that it is more to procure accommodation for the troops than for any other purpose. Were I to entertain any apprehension of the approach of the enemy beyond Coimbra, I should not think it prudent ■ station your corps ■ Pombal, twenty miles distant, and ■ far from the main body. ■■ lest any unforeseen ■■■■■ should arise, I conceive it proper to give you these instructions.

“ I have reason to believe that there is a considerable collection of Portuguese armed persons, ■ and about Coimbra, ■■■ advanced ■ far ■ the Vouga River, under the command of Colonel Trant. Colonel Trant has written to me, that the enemy ■■■ pushed patrols and videttes as far as the opposite side of the river; and he ■■■■■ the enemy's force to be rather considerable. In ■■ of his letters he estimates the cavalry ■ 2000, and the infantry at about 2500. But I understand that latterly their advanced posts had been retired. Colonel Trant, I ■■ sure, will be very glad to receive any communication from you, and give you ■ the information he may possess.

“ Situated ■ you will be, your chief object is to gain as much intelligence ■ your distant situation from the enemy will permit, and prevent any predatory incursion, either ■ annoy you, or give us any alarm that would discredit the opinion of security from all insult which we imagine.

“ Should a small force of the enemy appear, I have ■ doubt but that you will make him repent his temerity; but if he approaches in superior numbers, ■ that you have reason to imagine his strength may be ■ increasing one, and such ■ would commit you in a general affair, I am to desire that you will fall back upon the main body, or towards them, giving ■■ the most immediate notice.

“ I have the honour to be, Sir,

“ Your most obedient servant,

“ J. CRADOCK, Lieut.-General.

“ Major-General Hill.”

The cautious spirit attributed to Sir John Cradock breathes in every line of this letter: but two days after its date, in the midst of the enthusiasm enkindled by the arrival of ■ ■ ■ Arthur Wellesley in Lisbon, to ■ ■ ■ sume the command, he departed to Gibraltar. The sickly aspect of uncertainty ■ ■ ■ changed into the

 ■ ■ ■ of highest expectation, and all were roused by the conviction that the day of mighty achievements
 ■ ■ ■ dawned for the deliverance of the Peninsula.

CHAPTER V.

ONLY AN OPORTO. — ~~ARRIVAL OF THE BRITISH GENERAL~~ —
 GENERAL HILL LEADING THE 3RD BATTALION OF INFANTRY. —
~~ARRIVAL AT BARRA OVAE.~~ — PASSAGE OF THE DOURO. — PAGET WOUNDED. — ~~GENERAL HILL TAKES THE COMMUNDE~~ — HIS ~~ARRIVAL AT THE SEMINARY.~~ — FLIGHT OF THE FRENCH TOWARDS VALLONGA. — LETTER OF GENERAL HILL. — COOLNESS OF THE OTHER CLEMENT. — ~~GENERAL HILL TAKES THE COMMUNDE~~ — VICTOR. — ~~ARRIVAL OF~~ LORD ~~WELLESLEY~~ — ~~GENERAL HILL TAKES THE COMMUNDE~~ — ~~ARRIVAL AT TALAVERA.~~ — ~~ARRIVAL OF LORD~~ — ~~ARRIVAL~~ ATTACK OF THE FRENCH. — BATTLE AT NIGHT. — BATTLE IN THE MORNING. — GENERAL HILL'S OWN ~~ARRIVAL~~ IN BOTH. —
 HIS ESCAPE. — CONDUCT OF ~~GENERAL HILL~~ AND THE ~~ARRIVAL~~ —
 LETTER FROM ~~GENERAL HILL~~ TAKEN FROM MONTIJO. — ~~ARRIVAL~~ IN THE FARM-HOUSE. — RURAL ~~ARRIVAL~~ — ~~ARRIVAL~~ VERY GAY. — ~~ARRIVAL OF LORD WELLESLEY~~ — ~~ARRIVAL~~ — HUNTSMAN. — ~~ARRIVAL~~ OF LORD WELLESINGTON.

MARSHAL SOULT, having invaded the northern provinces of Portugal from Galicia, had taken possession of Oporto rather ~~more~~ than three weeks before Sir Arthur Wellesley reached Lisbon. He hesitated for a time ~~to~~ to whether he should combine with General Cuesta in ~~his~~ operation against Victor, who ~~was~~ on the Alemtejo frontier, ~~to~~ dispossess Soult of the town of Oporto, and the fertile province in his hands. The latter project ~~was~~ adopted; and the British leader assembled the chief portion of his troops at Coimbra, and unknown to the French marshal — himself in a perilous position, from the disaffection pervading his own ranks — gained the advantage of securing two most important lines of movement: the one lay through Viseu and Lamego, by which he might turn the [ ] of the enemy, and cut them off from Tras-os-Montes; the other [ ] the direct road to Oporto, by which he could come suddenly on their right in superior numbers, and inflict [ ] it a heavy blow, between the rivers Vouga and Douro. Sir Arthur availed himself of both these routes, but decided that his principal attack should be [ ] the latter. Marshal Beresford, on the 6th of May, marched towards Lamego, by the Visen road with his separate corps, including six thousand Portuguese; and the bulk of the army was formed in three divisions of infantry, and one of cavalry. Major-General Hill commanded the third division of infantry; the first being under Lieutenant-General Paget, and the second under Lieutenant-General Sherbrooke. The cavalry [ ] commanded by Lieutenant-General Payne. It having been discovered by Sir Arthur Wellesley that the lake of Ovar, extending twenty miles behind the French outposts, was unguarded, he decided on endeavouring to turn their right, by conveying troops by water to that town. This enterprise [ ] entrusted to General Hill, to whom he wrote thus from Coimbra:—

“ My dear Hill,

“ Coimbra, 8th May, 1809, 11 P.M.

“ We halted yesterday, to give General Beresford time to get forward, and we proceed upon our operations to-morrow. You will receive from the Quarter-Master-General [ ] paper fully explanatory to you of [ ] [ ] it is intended you should perform; [ ] which I have only [ ] add—first, that you [ ] [ ] the boats ready for you at Aveiro, and will have to get boatmen only, in which Douglas, whom I send to you, will assist you; secondly, that I mean you should bring to to-morrow night in such a place, as that the enemy cannot discover you, in that part of the river or lake of which the banks are swampy; thirdly, that you land your light infantry below the town, where it is certain the enemy is, in order to secure the unmolested disembarkation of the remainder of your corps at Ovar, where it is possible the enemy may have a small patrol.

I recommend you to cook a day's provisions at Aveiro, for your men for the 10th, and refresh your men at Ovar, while you will wait there to learn the progress of General Cotton, with his cavalry.

“ Having communicated with that General, you will then move from Ovar by the road which leads from Ovar to Feira, that road meets the great road from Coimbra to Oporto. You will halt there you will be joined by the cavalry. My intention is to push the enemy as far as I can the 10th, into Oporto, if possible.

“ Ever yours most sincerely,

“ ARTHUR WELLESLEY.

“ Major-General Hill.”

This letter I have copied from the original; and as the advance upon Oporto is one of the most remarkable movements of its illustrious writer, and an eminent instance of the talent and sagacity of the officer addressed, I subjoin the “ paper ” from the Quarter-Master-General. It is headed — “ Confidential memorandum of arrangements for the advance of the army towards Oporto ”: —

“ Head-Quarters, Coimbra, May, 1809.

“ The brigade under M.-General Hill, which is already ordered to be at Aveiro on the instant, will embark the same day on board boats to be procured there, so as the disembarkation may be completed a few minutes before low water, about 11 o'clock,

“ M.-General Hill will then proceed from Aveiro towards Ovar, but he will give previous orders to the boats to bring to about two or three leagues short of Ovar, (the object of this delay is to prevent the enemy being aware of General Hill's approach before M.-General Cotton advanced his out-posts,) where the boats remain until slack water on the morning of the 10th (about 4 A.M.), when whole will again proceed.

" M.-General Hill will cause three companies of light infantry to be disembarked at a landing-place about half a league from Ovar, upon the western side of lake, which companies will advance by land to Ovar, so as to possess themselves of the town and harbour for the disembarkation of the remainder of the corps.

" M.-General Hill will advance from Ovar the morning of the 10th, but not until he has had communication with M.-General Cotton, or has ascertained that M.-General Cotton has reached Oliveira, upon the Oporto road.

" M.-General Cotton is instructed to endeavour to communicate with M.-General Hill from that point, and M.-General Hill will be pleased also to use every endeavour to procure information of the movements of the enemy, and the advance of M.-General Cotton the Oporto road. M.-General Hill will direct his march from Ovar by the road which leads towards the village of Feira, and which the great road to Oporto, it is understood, in the neighbourhood of Santo Ridondo. M.-General will, however, obtain more accurate information respecting his road at Ovar.

" At the point where this road joins that to Oporto the junction of M.-General Hill's corps, and that under M.-General Cotton, will be formed, when both will proceed to Oporto.

" M.-General Cotton advance from the river Vouga very early hour morning of the 10th instant, supported by B.-General Stewart's brigade, and the King's German Legion. The object of movement is to surprise and carry the posts of the enemy at Albergaria Nova, and along the Oporto road, and after the junction with M.-General Hill, to press back the enemy, and, should an opportunity offer, to pass the bridge of Oporto with the rear guard of the enemy; at all events, to prevent his destroying the bridge, or removing the boats which may be upon the left bank of the river.

"B.-General Cameron's brigade of infantry, with a brigade of light six-pounders, arrived at Aveiro on the instant, and followed M.-General Hill's corps. Boats are to be sent back, therefore, without delay for the conveyance of that brigade to Ovar.

"Precautions are to be taken to prevent the escape of the boats, and their proceeding direct to their destination.

"M.-General Hill will inform himself at Ovar respecting the roads which lead from that place towards the river Vouga, lest events should render it necessary to use them. A patrol of Portuguese cavalry will be directed to proceed very early in the morning of the 10th, by the road which leads from Angeja to Ovar, there to join M.-General Hill's corps.

"GEO. MURRAY, Q.-M.-G."

General Hill, having received his instructions, embarked at Aveiro on the evening of the 9th, and arrived at Ovar on the 10th, just at sunrise, having been assiduously helped in passing the lake by the fishermen. Various circumstances of a trifling character, however, conspired to frustrate these arrangements, and the enemy was, for a short time, rescued from his peril by a masterly retreat on the part of Franceschi. He passed within a tantalizing distance of General Hill, who showed consummate judgment in refraining from attacking him, as it was contrary to the rules laid down for his guidance to act on the enemy's rear. His division, therefore, moved quietly towards Oporto, which place the repulsed French reached with considerable loss, in time to destroy the bridge over the Douro, and to congratulate themselves on their imaginary security because that river rolled between them and their pursuers, while the veterans of Napoleon's army were ready to defend the passage of its wide and rapid stream. Thus apparently foiled in his designs, Sir Arthur Wellesley ascended the height of Sarea fully impressed with the importance, especially as regarded the operations of Marshal Beresford, of instantly crossing the Douro. The glance of his searching eye and the decision of his genius were almost simultaneous, and he determined to pass over, in spite of every difficulty, to a building called the Seminary, the very point which, from the obstacles it presented, Soult supposed to be perfectly inaccessible. He had previously ordered Major-General Murray to be at Avintas, about four miles above Oporto, with a battalion of the Hanoverian Legion, a squadron of cavalry, and two six-pounders, if boats could be obtained for this purpose. For himself he was resolved, if only one boat could be found, to make his way over the river to the Seminary; and he succeeded in obtaining, unperceived, three or four barges. When the first of these came up, its arrival was reported to Sir Arthur. "Well! let the men cross," he answered in an instant; and within a quarter of an hour after the words had passed his lips, an officer and twenty-five soldiers of the Buffs were upon the bank occupied by the enemy, and the Seminary was gained without the least symptom of alarm. A second boat followed, then a third conveying General Paget; and scarcely had they stepped on shore, when the city rang with the din of arms, the roll of drums, and the tumultuous shouts of surprised citizens and soldiers rushing to the Seminary. The brave

Paget appeared upon the walls, but ■ instantly wounded and disabled. General Hill, who had crossed in splendid style with the 48th and 66th regiments, assumed the command. Soult was his opponent, and the assault furious in the extreme. Murray had not come up. The moment was critical; but Sir Arthur had such confidence in Hill, that he was satisfied ■ the earnest entreaties of those around him, to remain on the spot, surveying the scene of action, and directing the English guns to play upon the enemy. General Hill did not disappoint him. Three battalions were now in the Seminary; and he advanced coolly to the enclosure wall, whence he opened such ■ fire on the passing columns of the French, that the result was their dispersion and the capture of five pieces of artillery. Shertbrooke crossed and entered the town in time to harass the rear of the hostile troops, who were quitting it. Then the forces under Murray were seen descending the steep from Avintas; and soon the shouts of the inhabitants proclaimed the evacuation of Oporto, and the flight of the enemy on the road to Vallonga. General Hill and his gallant aids-de-camp Captain Currie and Lieutenant Clement Hill received, with the other brave officers and troops, the cordial acknowledgments of Sir Arthur Wellesley, who had, by their aid, achieved the renowned passage of the Douro. "They have marched," said his despatch, "in four days, over eighty miles of most difficult country, have gained many important positions, and have engaged and defeated three different bodies of the enemy's troops." The results ■■■ briefly detailed by General Hill in ■ letter to his sister : —

■ My dear Sister,

“ Oporto, May 22. 1809.

“ On the 13th I wrote to you, and gave a hasty ■ count of ■ proceedings to that day : the particulars you will have ■ in the Gazette before this reaches you. I ■ this instant informed that ■ bag will be made up and despatched for England by seven o'clock ; and ■ it is nearly that time now, I have not a moment to lose. Events have turned out exactly ■ expected. Marshal Soult's army got ■ completely beat and frightened ■ the 12th, that their retreat became a perfect flight. ■ cannot, for want of time, enter into particulars at this moment, but beg to tell you that the morning after the enemy ran from this place our army pursued them, keeping close to their rear, and following them near 100 miles ■ the Braga road, to the frontier of Spain, about 50 miles on the other side of Braga. On this occasion the enemy suffered considerably, lost all their guns, greater part of their baggage and ammunition, and upon the whole are so much beaten, that it is thought impossible they can ever think of returning. The French loss, upon the whole, is upwards of 3000 men, including prisoners.

“ The French, having another force in the South of Portugal, under Victor, and knowing of our advance towards Soult, commenced moving to the North, in the direction of Castello Branco, which made our return to Oporto necessary ; and, indeed, I fancy we shall lose no time in getting to Coimbra. When Victor hears of Soult's fate, I ■ pretty sure he will not advance further ; and if he should, we have sufficient force to meet him. I ■ you ■ prospects ■ good. Clement does not feel the least inconvenience from his wound, but his eyes are sore from the heat of the sun, and effects of the cold nights and long marches. ■ have not heard of John Holding.* Dido is safe. In the greatest haste, “ Yours ever ■ truly,

“ ■ Hill, Hawkstone, Shrewsbury.”

“ R. HILL.

* His servant.

Lieutenant Clement Hill's own allusion to his wound is characteristic of the coolness of that officer, whose name ■■■ honourably mentioned in Sir Arthur Wellesley's despatch. In writing to his brother Robert, he said, " Seeing my name among the wounded would, of course, alarm some of you, although it ■■■ mentioned ■■ slight. You would not think much ■■■ the matter with ■■■ when you got my letter. ■■ I never thought the knock I got worth mentioning, and had not the least idea I had been returned, and would not believe it till I saw it in print. The fact was, the officer who made out the returns happened to be standing near me at the time ■ ball struck ■■ on the hip, just where my sash was tied. It was, of course, nearly spent, though it gave ■■ a good rap, and I thought it was a worse job than it was, and was agreeably surprised to find the ball had not entered. The place was black for some time, and I was a little stiff, but I had nothing to call a wound. The more bloody the account of an action appears, the better it goes down with John Bull; and I suppose the officer who made out the list thought my ■■■ would add to the number; and I know he thought it would be of service to me, though I wish he had thought ■ little more of the feelings of my friends. The way in which the General and his staff ■■ mentioned, in the other part of the despatch, is, of course, highly flattering to ■■ all."

This letter was addressed to Major Robert Hill, of the Royal Horse Guards, Blue, afterwards Lieutenant-Colonel of the same regiment, and ■■■ Sir Robert Chambre Hill. The General, with his accustomed fondness for his pets, did not forget to mention his favourite "Dido," a most sagacious animal. His brother, and aid-de-camp, whose letter has been just quoted, also made allusion to her: "I must tell you," he wrote, "how careful she is of her family. Two of them have been brought in in a basket; and the other morning, when the baggage was going off, she went up stairs by herself, and brought the basket in her mouth for the puppies to be put in." In this simple and good-natured manner these brave brothers relieved the tedium of their campaigns, and diverted the attention of those who received their letters at home, from the weightier cares occasioned by solicitude for their safety.

The next communication from General Hill to his friends at Hawkstone is dated "Abrantes, June 17th, 1809," where the British army was encamped, full of energy and spirit, but without money, shoes, or means of transport, while its energetic leader was assiduously endeavouring to overcome these and other impediments to his march into Spain. "We have been," says General Hill, in this letter, "at Abrantes about nine days, and I think it probable we shall remain here some time longer to await events. The fate of this country and Spain, in my mind, depends entirely on what happens elsewhere. If Bonaparte subdues Austria, and we keep all quiet in the North, the Peninsula must fall. At present, our immediate neighbour and opponent, Marshal Victor, is rather retiring, but I dare say he will not go far, if he has reason to expect reinforcements. The last accounts were, that he had left Merida, and was falling back on Madrid." After these remarks, he proceeded to make some observations ■ the interpretation put by Lord Castlereagh ■ the despatch of Sir Arthur Wellesley, respecting the passage of the Douro. His words will explain the point in question, and confirm the statement already made of the services he rendered at that critical juncture: — "No officer is more deserving of praise than General Paget; but he was wounded so very early in the business, that he was not present when the serious attacks were made, and which, indeed, did not take place till after the greater part of the 66th and 48th had come up, although Lord Castlereagh, by his note to the [Lord] Mayor, would wish it to be understood that General Paget and the Buffs resisted the whole French army." History has corrected this mistaken version of Sir Arthur's official account; and the remarks of General Hill to his relatives are in unison with the view taken by Napier, in his narrative of the proceedings of that memorable day. In the same letter General Hill thus notices Mr. Mackworth, afterwards on his staff, and now Sir Digby Mackworth, of Glen Usk: — "Mr. Mackworth is ■ fine young man: I wish I had it in my power to show him more civility. All I can do for him is occasionally to give him ■ bad dinner." General Hill's opinion of this officer was confirmed in every step of his future life down to the year 1831, when he rendered such excellent service during the dreadful riots at Bristol, under circumstances of peculiar difficulty. His kind general, at the time of his receiving him in Portugal, was by no ■■■■■ well accommodated, for his brother

thus described their position at Abrantes: — "The troops are most of them encamped in huts [REDACTED] the town, and [REDACTED] living in a small house near."

It [REDACTED] not till the 26th of June that the arrangements of Sir Arthur Wellesley permitted an advance towards Spain, when, having received the money he had applied for, but still without the expected reinforcements, he determined to move. On that day Mr. Clement Hill wrote home,—"We shall be off in the morning. We have our route for eight days, which will bring us into Spain. The first town [REDACTED] enter is Zarza-la-Mayor, which is in the direction for Madrid; and I hope it will not be long before we are in that city." The town here mentioned was reached on the 2d of July, and by the 8th of that month Sir Arthur and the advanced guard had arrived at Placentia. Perplexities of every description surrounded the British general; but the ardour of his unquenchable spirit rose superior to them all, and was caught by the troops he commanded, though under the pressure of hunger and every species of privation. He sternly repressed all disposition to plunder, while he spared no exertion to relieve the wants of his soldiers. Their numbers had been much exaggerated. This [REDACTED] out of the manner in which the returns were made, affording to Sir Arthur just grounds for the complaints he addressed to Lord Castlereagh on the subject from Castello Branco [REDACTED] the 30th of June, when the reinforcements announced had not arrived. On the other hand, the French were in immense strength, under the most eminent marshals of Bonaparte. Victor, who was nearest the allies, mustered [REDACTED] large force in Estremadura; Sebastiani [REDACTED] in La Mancha; Dessolles defended Madrid; Kellerman and Bonnet occupied old Castile, and a portion of Leon and the Asturias — the whole being nominally under the usurper Joseph, assisted by Marshal Jourdan. Soult, Mortier, and Ney were in the North, while Suchet and Angereau commanded large forces in Aragon and Catalonia. To these may be added the troops occupying ports or fortresses, besides such as were employed in keeping open the several lines of communication. Thus the allies were surrounded by an overwhelming superiority of disciplined forces, whom Bonaparte had directed to crush Wellesley in masses—a design this great general foresaw at the very time the French emperor, unknown to him, originated it. To make Sir Arthur's situation even more difficult, his Spanish coadjutor was General Cuesta, whom he found "more and more impracticable every day," and who, with the exception of certain ebbs and flows of rash courage, was the completest burlesque upon a commander of an army that can be conceived. For example, he came to meet the British General at a reconnoissance of Victor's position in a coach-and-six, out of which he was jolted by the roughness of the ground, and then he took a nap under a tree. But this drowsiness would have done no harm, had he not obstructed the plans of Sir Arthur by the most inconceivable obstinacy, which the latter mildly designated "whimsical perverseness of disposition." On the 24th of July, when the enemy had been dislodged without a battle, he actually, in a fit of mad jealousy, rushed forward singly in pursuit of the French, leaving Sir Arthur alone to exercise the caution he found it necessary to recommend to this heretofore sleepy, obstinate "old gentleman." The Spaniards, as foreseen, driven back, and came towards the English army near Talavera, in a state of confusion impossible to describe, till at length they passed to the rear, and ere long the movements of Victor plainly indicated that a great conflict was approaching. The genius of Wellesley with the perils thickening around him. Finally, the obstinacy of Cuesta gave way, and he consented to directions which placed him in front of Talavera on the right of the Tagus, where nature and art combined to defend him from serious attack. The left of the line was open in front, the extreme resting upon a steep hill, which was the key of the position, and there the trusty subject of these pages was placed with a division of infantry. Sir Arthur thus described this portion of his arrangements:—"The position taken up by the troops at Talavera extended rather more than two miles: the ground was open upon the left, where the British army stationed, and it was commanded by a height, which was placed in echelon, as the second line, a division of infantry under the orders of Major-General Hill."

It was on the 26th of July that Cuesta gave orders to retreat, after his sudden push to Torrijos; and on the 27th, Napier observes, Sir Arthur, by virtue of his genius, assumed the command of both armies. The previous condition of affairs is described by General Hill in a letter to his sister, dated "Talavera, July 25." "If," he says, "you received my last from Placentia, you will have been informed of my movement towards Talavera, which commenced the 17th, the day after I wrote to you, and we finished in six days. On the third day of our march we were joined by Cuesta's army, which advanced with the British to this place, where, as we expected, we found Victor strongly posted, having the Tagus upon his left, and a small river, the Alberche, in his front and on his right. Sir Arthur Wellesley, I understand, urged the necessity of an immediate attack. General Cuesta, it is said, wished to postpone it. Certain, however, it is that nothing was done on the day of our arrival or the next, during which time the French remained with every appearance of making us stand, which determined our two chiefs to attack them with our united force the next morning at day-break, the British on their left, and the Spaniards on the right. Dispositions were made accordingly, and we began to move about one o'clock in the night. At day-break we were at the points fixed on, fully persuaded that in a few minutes we should have been engaged, when, to the surprise of every one, we found that the French were off, and not a man to be seen. They had departed during the night, and taken the road to Madrid. What the result of this will be, I cannot tell. If we can get the French out of Spain (which I do not think unlikely) without our action, I shall be satisfied. If, however, that should not be the case, it may be an unfortunate circumstance that they went off; for although our loss must consequently have been great, yet I am confident, with God's assistance, that we should have beat them. It seems most annoying that we are not able to follow them, owing to a total want of supplies. The Spanish government has not in any one respect fulfilled its promise in regard to supplying the British army with provisions, in consequence of which, and our [REDACTED] bad commissaries, the troops and horses have been very badly fed of late. Instead of our having supplies to take on, the soldiers have not yet had meat or bread for yesterday, and it will not be possible for [REDACTED] to [REDACTED] [REDACTED] for [REDACTED] days, which probably will prevent our seeing the French again; for I [REDACTED] inclined to think we shall not follow them a great way unless they wait, which does not appear very likely after giving up this country and their strong position. The people are in high spirits at seeing the French run — a sight they never [REDACTED] before. The Spanish armies are strong and will increase. It is true they are badly disciplined, but their inveteracy towards the French is so great that they are formidable. No Frenchman falls into their hands without suffering death. The General who [REDACTED] taken a short time ago was kept alive, not from respect to French generals, but [REDACTED] being a valuable prize."

At the juncture described in this letter, Cuesta advanced. Sir Arthur remarked, "I am only afraid he will get himself into a scrape: any movement by me to his assistance is quite out of the question." His inglorious return has been already noticed, [REDACTED] well [REDACTED] his tardy submission to the master-mind of Wellesley. Hence [REDACTED] the demonstration on the part of the French, which led to the disposition of the allied forces alluded to before the introduction of this account by General Hill. When he wrote it, he little imagined that the day of [REDACTED] danger, escape, and glory was so [REDACTED].

King Joseph slept on the 26th ■ St. Ollalla, but ■ up before break of day, and his troops ■ put in motion ■ the ■ cast its early beams for the last time, upon numbers who had watched for its rise with eager hopes of ■ decisive day: but not till it had been three hours past its meridian did the fight begin. At that time Sir Arthur Wellesley ■ in the Casa de Salinas. To reach this place, the French had to ford the Alberche, and to march some distance through woods, out of which they emerged ■ suddenly, that they had nearly made him prisoner at the instant of surprise. Providentially, this disaster was not permitted to fall upon our army, and upon Europe. The impetuous onset of the enemy caused our troops to withdraw with some loss, but with such steadiness and discipline, that they returned upon and checked the forces which had attacked them. Victor soon exhibited a magnificent display, which issued from the forest, and advanced against the combined armies. It was dusk when he opened his cannonade ■ the left of the British position, and directed his cavalry against the infantry of Spain. "This attempt," Sir Arthur's despatch says, "entirely failed." "Early in the night," the ■ document states, "he pushed a division along the valley ■ the left of the height occupied by General Hill, of which he gained ■ momentary possession; but Major-General ■ attacked it instantly with the bayonet, and regained it." It was ■ night of awful struggle; opposing flashes of musketry, seemingly close to each other, sparkled in the gloom. At length, cessation of firing permitted the conquering shouts of the British soldiers audibly to proclaim that their stern opponents were repulsed into the ravine below. Shortly afterwards the flames of the bivouac fires of both armies shot upwards to the darkened skies, and the fighting was over; but eight hundred English and a thousand French were lost in that tremendous fray. In the morning the French came forth again; and, to use the words of Sir Arthur Wellesley, "the general attack began by the march of several columns of infantry into the valley, with a view to attack the height occupied by Major-General Hill." Various have been the descriptions of his brave conduct that day, all agree in their estimate of the great military qualities he displayed. His own narration will be found in a letter to his sister, written on the spot:—

"My dear Sister,

"Talavera, July 30, 1809.

"God has protected Clement and myself in two of the severest battles I ever witnessed, which took place on the 27th and 28th. For the particulars I must refer you to the public despatches, but cannot help mentioning a few circumstances which will show you the providential escapes we have had. About a week ago I told you that the French had retired from Talavera, on our approach towards them. It appears they did this, not with the intention of going off altogether, but for the purpose of meeting their reinforcements, which being done by the junction of Sebastiani's force of about 12,000, and King Joseph, from Madrid, with 6000, they turned back with near 50,000, with a determination to bring the whole of it against the British army, not half that number in the field. Early on the 27th we heard of the returning of the French, and as the day advanced they approached nearer. By four in the evening their whole force was in sight, and continued moving forward, driving in our outposts, they were within reach of shot from our lines, when they halted; and as night was coming on we were not expect any serious attack ■ the next morning. It was, however, scarcely dusk when there was a heavy fire of musketry on my post, and ■ severe struggle on the part of the enemy to carry it, in which they ■ not succeed, and in about half an hour gave up the contest. On this occasion poor Fordyce ■ killed, my horse was shot, and I myself had a fortunate escape from the hands of a French soldier who had got hold of my right arm, and would have secured me if my horse had not at the moment sprung forward. The French- ■ fired ■ me, but did not touch me. Clement and Captain Currie were in the midst of the whole, but fortunately escaped. Nothing very particular occurred during the night: we continued in ■ position, and the enemy was near ■ My post ■ on the left, General Sherbrooke in the centre, and General Campbell to his right, and all the Spaniards to General Campbell's right. In the morning when day broke we observed the whole French army drawn up in order of battle; the greater part of their force immediately opposite my post, which was evidently the point of attack, and which, if they could have gained, would have given them the day. Sir Arthur Wellesley came to it, and in about half an hour after the sun was up an immense column, since known to consist of two divisions of 7000 each, under Marshal Victor in person, moved on and attacked us. The fire was tremendous ■ both sides, but the French could not force us. My horse ■ wounded early in the action. ■ got another from an officer. Shortly before the enemy gave up the conflict, I was struck by ■ musket-ball near my left ear and the back of my head. The blow ■ ■ violent that ■ ■ obliged to leave the field. I continued unwell the whole of the next day, and the next; I am, however, thank God, much better to day. My hat saved my life; it has suffered as much ■ my helmet did on the 13th of March. Clement is safe: his horse ■ killed, and he had three musket-balls in him on the 28th. Currie is also safe, but had his horse killed under him. During the attack on me the enemy ■ not allow the remainder of the line to be quiet, for, with their ■ artillery, they kept up a constant and destructive ■ ■ it, not regarding the Spaniards all. In about four or five hours the enemy's slackened for a short time; they, however, afterwards began a serious attack upon General Campbell they did upon and, meeting with the reception from the whole as they did in the morning, fairly beat, in the evening after dark went off. The loss on both sides very great. Indeed, ours probably 4000, the enemy's 7000. King Joseph in the field, though not in the fire. When it considered that the French force was double ours, and solely employed against the British, may count the battle of Talavera amongst the most glorious that ever took place. You must this hasty account—in indeed I must again refer you to the official details. The French said be still retreating. Kind remembrance to dear friends Hawkstone, who, I sure, will be sensible of and thankful for the providential escapes have had."

(On the 1st of August he wrote again:—

"My dear Sister,

"Talavera, August 1st, 1809.

Two days ago I wrote to you a long and hasty letter, giving you some account of the glorious actions which had been fought between the British and the French on the 27th and 28th. The letter, I dare say, will go to England by the same ship which will convey this, provided it reaches Lisbon; but the communication between and Lisbon is rather uncertain, I send this by a different route. There never a more severe action fought than that of the 28th, honour gained by army than was obtained on both days. I must, however, observe, that it was a dear-bought victory, for, out of 18,000 British, I fear you will find, by the returns, loss to be near 200 officers killed and wounded, and about . . . . . Another such victory would be a serious for . . . . . The French have suffered certainly than did, and retiring towards Madrid, but I doubt whether they will far. The Spaniards very numerous, but have yet done nothing either in fighting or supplying with provisions. Unless a change takes place,

I think [REDACTED] shall not agree long. The conveyance of letters [REDACTED] now become so uncertain, [REDACTED] be careful what I say. My head, thank God, is much better; I have [REDACTED] pain, and merely a little stiffness about the neck. My horses, I think, will [REDACTED]. The one I rode on the 27th, when I [REDACTED] in the midst of the French in the dark, [REDACTED] wounded through the belly; the other had two shots through the withers, and [REDACTED] the saddle. Your little mare is well, and so is Dido, and John Holding looks [REDACTED] great deal better than when he left England. Joseph may remain where he is, for I think [REDACTED] stay is rather uncertain. We shall not go to Coruña again, but, in [REDACTED] of accidents, [REDACTED] have fortunately Gibraltar and Cadiz under our lee. If the Austrians [REDACTED] successful, and the Spaniards will give us assistance, all will go on well. Clement joins in kind remembrance to all.

"I remain,

"Yours most affectionately,

"R. II."

In the year 1827 a military officer of high rank requested from General Hill the favour of a memorandum explanatory of his own escape, with which he complied [REDACTED] follows, in his truly unaffected style: —

"I recollect [REDACTED] the 27th of July I got some dinner in my quarters in the town of Talavera about four o'clock. Immediately after I rode out, accompanied by Major Fordyce, towards the Alberche, in which direction we heard [REDACTED] firing. [REDACTED] returned to the bivouac of my division, I suppose about sunset, when I found it had moved to take up [REDACTED] position. I instantly followed it, and found it deploying in line, and [REDACTED] shown by somebody where the right was to rest. I pointed out the hill on the line of direction we were to take up. I found, however, I had not sufficient troops to occupy the ground without leaving considerable intervals between the regiments. During this operation I recollect perfectly well that I was with the 48th Regiment, in conversation with Colonel Donellan, when, [REDACTED] being nearly dark, I observed some ■■■ the hill-top fire a few shots amongst ■■■ Not having ■■■ idea that the enemy ■■■ so near, I said ■■■ the moment, I ■■■ ■■■ was the Old Buffs, ■■■ usual, making some blunder. ■■■ desired Donellan to get into line, ■■■ I would ride up the hill and stop their firing. On reaching the hill-top, I found the mistake ■■■ had made. I immediately turned round to ride off, when they fired and killed poor Forlyce, and shot my ■■■ through the body. She did not fall, but carried ■■■ to the 29th Regiment, which corps, by my orders, instantly charged the French, and drove them from the hill. I do not know what numbers the enemy had, but I think they ■■■ ■■■ strong — perhaps ■■■ of their light troops."

The poor old coach-and-six general had no further part in this affair than sending two pieces of cannon to Sir Arthur Wellesley, when he desired reinforcements against the powerful artillery of the French. He went, however, into a furious rage with his troops for being terrified into confusion, though not attacked, which ended in their decimation, and the execution of the decimated. Some, however, of the Spaniards showed true bravery, and the couple of guns just adverted to were most efficiently served; but the general condition of Cuesta's army, and the exhausted state of the British, who were upon the scantiest food, rendered all pursuit at the close of the second day's victory impossible, and the triumph ■■■ dearly won. The army of Sir Arthur passed that night on the cold damp field, amidst the dead, the wounded, and the dying, while ■■■ many of the disabled as they could remove, found their hospitals in the convents of Talavera. The morning after the last action General Cuesta wrote, for publication in the Spanish Gazette, — "I cannot express myself sufficiently to celebrate the admirable courage of the English army, and its excellent general, and of our own troops also!" Sir Arthur Wellesley ~~was~~ elevated to the peerage on the 26th of August by the titles of Baron Douro of Wellesley, and Viscount Wellington of Talavera; but he did not receive the official notification till the 16th of September, and up to that period retained his old signature. His Majesty ~~was~~ also pleased to appoint General ~~Hill~~ to the colonelcy of the 94th Regiment; and Mr. Perceval, in the House of Commons, on the vote of thanks from the Houses of Parliament, paid him a distinguished compliment. The conduct of the Spaniards was disgraceful beyond all conception. They would neither supply provisions, relieve the wounded, nor help to bury the dead, refusing, as Sir Arthur observed, "assistance and necessities which any other country in the world would have given even to its enemies." At length this bad faith, and the consequent difficulties he encountered, together with the wants and privations of his troops, and the various movements of the French, induced him to contemplate withdrawing towards Portugal. There were many varying opinions at the time respecting Sir Arthur's speedy change from the victorious offensive to defensive operations; but it will be found that General Hill entirely approved of these celebrated movements, and denounced the Spaniards equally with his chief. He wrote thus from Merida:—

"My dear Sister,

"Merida, August 30th, 1809.

"I ~~own~~ I never entertained any sanguine expectations from ~~our~~ assistance we were likely to receive from the

Spaniards. Their conduct [REDACTED] year [REDACTED] sufficient [REDACTED] satisfy all who witnessed it, that [REDACTED] were engaged in a hopeless [REDACTED]. What has now happened I trust will convince our rulers at home that a small English force alone [REDACTED] drive the French out of Spain, and that Spaniards [REDACTED] neither willing nor able to do much for themselves. In the battle [REDACTED] Talavera, the Spaniards might have rendered [REDACTED] [REDACTED] [REDACTED] tial service. There really appeared on that occasion, [REDACTED] thing like a mutual agreement between the French and Spaniards not to molest each other. During the whole of the actions the French employed all their force against the British, and at no time did the Spaniards attempt to give us any assistance. The conduct of Spain with respect to supplying [REDACTED] with provisions is, if possible, worse than their behaviour in the field. Previous to our entering the country they promised every kind of supply, and carriages for the sick; and I know they have done nothing, in consequence of which many sick and wounded have been left behind, and the army has suffered great privations for want of food, and is now, I [REDACTED] sorry to say, much reduced and very ineffective. Under all these circumstances, I think Sir Arthur Wellesley has acted wisely in retiring, and we are now by easy marches proceeding towards Elvas in Portugal, where I imagine [REDACTED] shall wait until orders arrive from England. The French [REDACTED] not following us, and give as a [REDACTED] that they have orders to that effect. They say they shall remain [REDACTED] the banks of the Tago about Talavera, until their expected reinforcements arrive from France, and on their coming they recommend the English should quit the Peninsula. * * *

* * * * * The French have likewise another report amongst them, which is that Napoleon [REDACTED] to restore Ferdinand to Spain, and [REDACTED] King Joseph to a throne in Germany — a [REDACTED] I do [REDACTED] think very improbable, for Ferdinand would be quite subservient to the will of Bonaparte, and by being sent to Spain would quiet the people, who, although not formidable, are troublesome. The French are particularly kind and attentive to our wounded [REDACTED] sick.

"7 o'clock. — I am just informed that the bag will be closed in a few minutes; I therefore only add that Clement and myself are perfectly well. I do not regret the inconvenience from the blow I got on the head. We shall, I think, be in Portugal in the course of five or six days. If the news from Austria continue unfavourable, we must quit our country, and it is the general opinion the sooner the better. Kind love to all.

"Yours ever."

It was impossible that Sir Arthur Wellesley could go on with such a man as Cuesta, or with the cowardly Spaniards he commanded, of whom he wrote to Lord Castlereagh, "Nearly 2000 ran off, on the evening of the 27th, from the battle of Talavera, not a hundred yards from the place where I was standing, who were neither attacked nor threatened with an attack, and who were frightened only by the noise of their own fire. They left their arms and accoutrements on the ground. Their officers went with them; and they and the fugitive cavalry plundered the baggage of the British army, which had been sent to the rear." Afterwards the one corps said to have behaved well at Talavera was away from the bridge of Arzobispo, leaving its guns; and the conduct of all parties had deprived Sir Arthur of the fruits of his victory, that he determined to remain with them no longer. In this decision, as we have seen, General Hill entirely agreed, and, in fact, had made a formal complaint that one of his foraging parties had been fired on by Spanish soldiers. But though Sir Arthur decided to fight no more with Spaniards, he was willing to fight for Spain, and consented, having consulted with his brother, the Marquis Wellesley, then in that country on a special mission, to remain for a time on the Spanish frontier, at least so far as to place General Hill's division at Montejo and La Calzada, and the heavy brigade of cavalry at Merida, where they could get forage. From the former of these places the General addressed the following interesting letter to Hawkstone:—

" Montejo, 10th Nov. 1809.

" I wrote to you from here about a fortnight or three weeks ago, since which time we have been, as we were for some time before, in daily expectation of some change taking place. Nothing particular, however, has occurred. The French remain on the Tagus, occupying the towns from Toledo to Orapesa. The Spanish army is in La Mancha; the British cantoned in the villages about 30 miles round Badajoz. None of the three armies seem to be inclined to move forward; the French show their weakness by remaining where they are, and we prove ours by allowing them to stay so quietly. I do not consider our prospects at all mended of late, consequently I entertain the same opinion I have always expressed respecting the country. The cause in my mind is hopeless, unless with some chance of success should be renewed between Austria and France—an event which does not seem very probable. Too much jealousy, I fear, exists between us and the Spaniards to give hopes of doing any good by acting together, and little can be expected from our separate efforts, for the Spaniards do not understand the business, and we have not numbers. Our army is much reduced; it is generally supposed that we have upwards of 30,000, but I assure you we could not bring more than 13,000 into the field. The sickness which prevails is dreadful, and the mortality melancholy. There are not less than 10,000 in the hospitals, besides some hundreds in a valescent state. The deaths during the last three weeks have, upon an average, been about short of fifty a day.

The rains have commenced, and I am told that I shall be more healthy. I thank God that Clement and myself enjoy good health. I do not know whether my future plans are fixed upon, but I really think I shall be off. It is generally thought that I shall march towards Lisbon, to wait events, and at the proper time to be in readiness to quit the country if necessary. We have heard of Lord Wellesley's appointment to the head of the new administration. He intended to leave Seville this day, and will probably reach England about the time you receive this. I am glad he is to come into office; he is certainly a very able man, and must know the Spaniards, and also our real situation in this country. It is now forty days, a very unusual time, since I have heard from England. We anxiously look for the next arrival, which will bring us the new arrangements respecting the administration, and in all probability a confirmation of the peace between France and Austria—an event which the French at Madrid have announced. I dare say you will see in the English papers that the Spaniards have adopted a new mode of government, and established a regency, a change which I fear will benefit them very little. You will likewise see an account of an action fought between the Spaniards and French at Tamames, not far from Salamanca, in which the valorous Spaniards claim a great victory. The fact is, the French with a small division attacked the Spaniards, who were five times their number, posted on strong ground at Tamames. The French were at first successful, took six guns, and made their cavalry go off. The Spanish infantry, however, not only maintained their ground, but in the end retook their guns, and the French retired with some loss. A Spanish officer writes to my friends in this village, and after giving an account of the action, he says he followed the French to Salamanca, and finding that they had quitted it, they entered the town, but that it was with "shaking chins," a Spanish proverb, which you may easily conceive implies great fear. Being in daily expectation of a move towards England, I will not desire Joseph to come out. We heard from Thomas lately; he was well. ■■■■ remembrances to all.

“I remain, yours very affectionately.”*

At Montejo General ■■■■ and his brother ■■■■ comfortably lodged in the house of ■ large farmer, whom they found ■ good kind of man; and they had the satisfaction of seeing ■ degree of plenty and happiness around them, to which they had been hitherto strangers in Spain. They ■■■■ about twenty miles from Badajos, where head-quarters were. One part of this house ■■■■ occupied by General Hill and the remainder by the farmer's family, who ■■■■ “all very civil without being troublesome.” Lieutenant Clement Hill described him as having “a wife and two daughters not quite of the first class, but dressing smart when they went to mass on a Sunday;” but in Budajos there was “a great display of beauty and fashion.” He added to this “almost all the wool is sent from this part to England. I cannot say much for the beauty of the sheep that produce it. Rowland has bought four from our landlord, which ■■■■ to ■■■■ company our milk goats, ■■■■ we have an opportunity of sending ■■■■ bringing them to England, to improve the Shropshire breed. We lead quite ■ quiet country life, going out a-coursing three times ■ week, though I should not wonder if Bonaparte gave us ■ chase of another sort ■■■■ of these mornings.” This sort of life quite suited the tastes of these heroic brothers, who “liked it much better than the gay town” of Badajos, where the inhabitants ■■■■ far from being * ■■■■ ■■■■ frequently ■■■■ from prudential motives ■■■■ omitted to sign his ■■■■ ■■■■ his ■■■■ case of their being intercepted ■■■■ at ■■■■ time. Probably this

■ civil to those who fought for their independence, as ■ the pleasant rural Montejo. Here the division of General Hill ■■■ reviewed by the commander-in-chief, who had then assumed the title of Viscount Wellington; and the services of its leader were acknowledged in his promotion to the rank of Lieutenant-General, which had indeed been some time previously urged by Lord Wellington as his just due.

The General himself wrote word home, "We have excellent coursing here, and now and then ■ fox-hunt, and sometimes attack a wild boar and the deer." With regard to more important matters he expressed himself, towards the end of November, to the following effect: "Affairs in this country seem to be drawing to a crisis. The Spanish army imprudently advanced towards Madrid; the French allowed them to get within eight leagues of the place, and then attacked them, and the result is that the Spaniards were entirely defeated and dispersed, lost fifty pieces of cannon, 15,000 prisoners, and about 8000 killed. Reinforcements are said to be on the march from France, the Spanish Government are quarrelling amongst themselves, and the British army is greatly reduced by sickness, which, I ■ sorry to say, is by no ■■■ abated since I wrote last." In December he again described his own position and views: —

"Montejo, Wednesday, 6th Dec., 1809.

"My dear Sister,

"A mail is despatched to England every Wednesday. I wrote ■ you by the last, since which time nothing very particular has occurred, and I have little to tell you now. The Spaniards, in consequence of the late dastardly conduct of their troops, seem to be ■ good ■■■ alarmed. The Govern-

Seville their flowery addresses and patriotic proclamations to be of little avail, and will make the people fight. I understand there is the greatest consternation amongst the rulers of this unhappy country; it is also said that their main army is entirely dispersed: indeed, we have daily opportunities of witnessing their run-aways passing through this neighbourhood. We likewise see the inhabitants of this part of the country burying and hiding their property, in expectation that it would otherwise fall into the hands of the enemy. The French are upwards of 150 miles from hence, and I do not hear of their having made any movement towards us since the victory over the Spaniards. Here we are in the same situation and state of uncertainty as when I wrote last. Our long stay here, I imagine, must be from political motives: I, therefore, in some degree look forward for a change when Lord Wellesley's sentiments respecting this country are made known by himself in London, and which we may expect to hear of in the course of a week. Our army continues to suffer much by sickness; my division has lost, in the last seven days, 60 men, besides the deaths which must have happened at the distant hospitals, and which I am sure cannot be less than 20 or 30. John Holding, the only invalid in my family, I am glad to say, is nearly recovered, and enjoyed our two last days' hunting with great spirit. By-the-by, I will enclose you a portrait of our Spanish huntsman, which Clement has hit off to nicety; the instrument in the mouth is not a vulgar tin horn, such as our huntsmen use, but a sort of pipe-lute, or whistle, with which the bearer occasionally plays a tune, to collect the dogs and animate the sportsmen. General Cotton is off for England, and I suppose will arrive there about the time you get this. He has represented that urgent business requires his presence at home, and his request has, of course, been granted. He says he shall soon be back.

"I think I told you that Colonel Leighton well. You hear from Clement or myself by the next packet. In the mean time believe me to be

"Yours very affectionately,

"R. H."

In the midst of all these uncertainties Lord Wellington, [REDACTED] Marshal-General of Portugal,* was contemplating, with a firmness of purpose and a magnificence of design characteristic of his surpassing genius, the defence of that country; and I copy from the letter written with his own hand his announcement and offer to General Hill:—

“ My dear Hill,

“ Badajoz, Dec. 16. 1809.

“ In the arrangements for the defence of Portugal I shall form two principal corps, both consisting of British and Portuguese troops, the largest of which will be to the northward, and I shall command it myself, and the latter will be for the present upon the Tagus, and hereafter it may be moved forward into Alemtejo; and I will not make any arrangement either as to the troops that are to comprise it, or as to the officer who is to command it, without offering the command of it to you.

“ At the [REDACTED] time, I will not separate you from the army, and from my own immediate command, without consulting your wishes; and I shall be glad to hear from you on this subject [REDACTED] [REDACTED] possible, as the arrangements for quartering and disposing of the troops depend upon your decision upon this point.

“ You will therefore send back either a messenger, if you [REDACTED] get one, or an officer, with your [REDACTED] [REDACTED] as possible.

“ I send your letters arrived by the English mail.

“ Ever yours most sincerely,

“ WELLINGTON.”

How the General felt such a mark of confidence, is expressed in his own words in a letter dated “Abrantes, January 4. 1810.” “You will not,” he says, “I am sure, be sorry to learn that we have quitted Spain, and are once more clear of the unhealthy plains of Estremadura. The whole of the British army ■ now in Portugal: how long our Government mean ■ shall remain here, ■ the French allow us, I cannot say. It, however, ■ to be the intention of the present rulers to try to defend Portugal, for which purpose Lord Wellington has formed, ■ he calls it, two principal corps, composed of British and Portuguese, the largest of which is gone to the northward, and he commands it himself; the other remains on the Tagus, which he has in the handsomest manner offered to me. I am aware of the importance of the situation I am placed in, and trust I shall be attended with the same good fortune ■ have hitherto experienced." General Hill deserved this trust, and the entire course of his subsequent services showed the wisdom of the selection.

CHAPTER VI.

HILL'S ARRIVAL. — DEPARTURE OF LORD WELLINGTON. — GENERAL HILL AND THE MARQUIS DE ROMANA. — ALL QUIET. — LETTER OF LORD WELLINGTON TO GENERAL HILL. — THE TAGUS. — SURRENDER OF CIUDAD RODRIGO. — DEPARTURE OF ROMANA. — BARRICADE. — GENERAL HILL'S WOUNDS. — GENERAL HILL BURIED IN A CHAPEL. — MUTUAL POLITENESS OF ENGLISH AND FRENCH. — ALMEIDA. — GENERAL HILL QUITS SAGEDAS. — FEARFUL ARRAY. — GENERAL HILL ASCENDS THE MOUNTAIN OF BUSACO. — SPLENDID SCENE. — BATTLE OF THE MOUNTAIN. — LORD WELLINGTON AND GENERAL HILL. — REGNIEU TOO NEAR. — SERVICES OF GENERAL HILL AT BUSACO. — GRAND SPECTACLE BY NIGHT. — THE FRENCH DE CAMP. — MOVEMENTS OF GENERAL HILL. — BARRICADE OF TORRES VEDRAS. — GENERAL HILL'S POSITION. — PARTIES OF PLEASURE FROM LISBON. — LETTERS OF GENERAL HILL. — HIS SEVERE ILLNESS. — SIR W. HERSCFORD VISITS HIM. — GENERAL HILL GOES HOME. — RECOVERS. — HIS RETURN TO LISBON TO THE ARMY.

THE beginning of the year 1810 was spent by General Hill at Abrantes, where Captain Patton of the Engineers was carrying on works of great importance, as part of Lord Wellington's plan for the defence of Portugal. The General supplied artificers from his corps for this purpose, and awaited his instructions, which were promised him as soon as possible in the following kind note:—

" My dear Hill,

" Coimbra, Jan. 6. 18(10).*

" I just write you a few lines to tell you that I have not forgotten you, but my hands have been so full of business since I [redacted] you that I have not [redacted] time to attend to your [redacted] yet. But you shall be fully instructed in the [redacted] of a day or two.

* I have in the original by mistake.

“ Ever yours sincerely,

— WELLINGTON.

“ Lieut.-General Hill.”

The instructions were given on the 9th, under which date they appear in the volumes of Colonel Gurwood.

The troops were at this time much recruited by the change of air and the fineness of the weather, while General Hill and his aid-de-camp had the gratification of being near their brother, Colonel Thomas Noel Hill, who was serving with the Portuguese army. He was then at Oporto, and proposed to pay them a short visit. His regiment was reported as in the highest order.

During the whole of January Lord Wellington and General Hill were in constant correspondence. Their letters related to movements of troops; accommodation for cavalry; payments; commissariat; ammunition; magazines; bridges; and other kindred matters. At length, on the 12th of February, Lord Wellington directed him to move forward to Portalegre, in consequence of the French having approached Badajoz. He was likewise desired to take [redacted] for the safety of the convalescents and sick, and to provide for the conveyance of the latter to Elvas. Much was left to his discretion, which was most satisfactorily performed. He [redacted] effected the removal of his corps, and was himself quartered at Portalegre in the house of [redacted] Señora Donna Francisca Rosa Barba,

■ most attentive hostess. The farmer of Montejo, their former landlord, whose ■ ■ Don Alonso Botello, would have been ■ glad to have changed situations with the Señora Rosa, for his house was ■ occupied by the French. In all his foreign quarters, the habits of the General in private were ■ domestic and unpretending ■ if he had been residing ■ his own country seat.

(One object of this advance was to protect Elvas and the sick in that town, but they were ■ quickly as possible removed to Lisbon. When the enemy heard of General Hill's arrival at Portalegre, they retired from Badajoz. The General had with him his own British division, two brigades of Portuguese infantry, about 4000 strong, under Major-General Hamilton, one brigade of British cavalry, amounting to 1000 in number, under Major-General Slade, the 4th regiment of Portuguese cavalry, and one brigade of German, and two of Portuguese artillery. He was instructed to co-operate with certain Spanish troops, then supposed to have crossed the Tagus, and to prevent the French, if possible, from attempting any serious operation against Badajoz, from which, as we have seen, they retreated on his approach. The strength of the enemy, as to numbers, and the celebrity of Napoleon's marshals who commanded them, were enough to have made the British generals pause, for much of the force they had to oppose to them ■ of at least doubtful efficiency, while every possible impediment was cast in their way. But in the consciousness of ■ good cause they persevered and triumphed.

It was in the month of March that the French corps in Estremadura broke up, and Mortier departed to the South; but Regnier, with Soult's corps, remained in the neighbourhood of Merida. General Hill was much complimented by Lord Wellington on the way in which he had strengthened his position at Portalegre, as well as on his arrangements for communication, and the punctuality of his advices. At the end of this month the French threatened them on all sides, but menaced too many points at a time to create much uneasiness as to any particular one; and Lord Wellington pronounced himself "in a situation in which no mischief could be done to the army or any part of it." He also characteristically observed, "I am prepared for all events; and if I am in a scrape, it appears to be the general belief in England, though certainly not my own, I'll get out of it." The Marquis de la Romana, who was in constant communication with General Hill, was afraid that the French would annoy Badajoz from Cáceres; and if this should be the General's opinion, he was permitted to show himself beyond the Sierra, but he was directed to incur no risk or unnecessary loss. The British commander was determined to follow out his own great plan, and not to harass his troops by marches and counter-marches in conformity with the motions of the enemy; and the issue proved that he was right. Towards the 11th of April the French appeared to be preparing to attack Ciudad Rodrigo and Almeida, which it was thought expedient to prevent, and certain movements were made with a view to these objects. A correspondence also took place between General Hill and Beresford respecting the disposition and food of the Portuguese cavalry. The Marshal wrote, "I regret, though I am not surprised, to find how much the Portuguese corps with you have wanted provisions. It is impossible to supply with the rascally junta de rirres, that provide, or rather do not provide, for this army." In another part of the same letter he added — "I was some time since thinking of paying you a visit, and to visit Elvas, and the other places on that frontier; but the gathering at Salamanca indicating the intention on the part of the enemy against Ciudad Rodrigo or Almeida, I cannot stir your way till something more decisive of their intentions appears." At length, on the 3d of May, Lord Wellington wrote to General Hill that the plot seemed to thicken; but that, after a careful perusal of previous instructions, he did not think it requisite to add to them. He also approved of a movement made to assist O'Donnell, which gratified the worthy Romana, who wrote to the General in English: "I am very anxious to give many thanks to your Excellency at this purpose." The nature of his next intercourse with both these personages will be best explained by General Hill himself: —

"My dear Sister,

"Portalegre, 11th May, 1810.

"A few days ago Clement wrote to you to inform you that we were to make the move — an advance I thought it right to make under the following circumstances: — On the 14th I received a letter from the Marquis of Romana, stating that 'the enemy presented themselves before Badajoz to mask an attack they intended to make, and perhaps are actually cutting off the communication of the position of Zafra. The fewness I have of troops to succour the post induces me to request your Excellency will please to order some regiments to march to support my troops. [redacted] is a [redacted] highly interesting for [redacted] safety of the province of Alentejo, therefore I dare pray the orders for its execution may be given immediately without any delay — if possible, even to-day, for to-morrow the attack will be made, if not already this day. I have [redacted] honour to [redacted] to your Excellency my ardent desire that this movement of the troops under your Excellency's [redacted] mand may take place, and at the same time the distinguished sentiments,' &c. &c.

" Another Spanish General, O'Donnell, informed me [redacted] the [redacted] time that 'the enemy, having collected the greater part of his forces [redacted] the left banks of the Guadiana, has made a movement towards Olivença, intending, it is supposed, to [redacted] off and attack Ballasteros' — the Spanish General at Zafra.

" In consequence of the above I moved forward, and in the night of the 14th, when I was at Arronches, I received three expresses, stating that the enemy had retired, and an official message from the Marquis Romana in the following words: 'The Marquis is most particularly obliged to you for the move you were pleased to make with the British and Portuguese troops, and is extremely anxious to have an interview with you to-morrow at Campo Mayor. His Lordship appears desirous that the British troops should not advance further, fearful it might attract attention, and [redacted] Regnier to be reinforced.'

" I accordingly met the Marquis, who confirmed the above, though at the [redacted] time expressed a wish that we should move on to [redacted] Merida — a proposition so imprudent and [redacted] trary to my instructions, that it was out of the question my complying with it. I returned to Portalegre, a point I do not like to be far distant from, in the event of our being wanted in another quarter. I [redacted] a very civil letter from Romana this day: he tells me the [redacted] my are still retiring, but I must confess I do [redacted] think they will go far.

" I have had a letter from Colonel Campbell this day: he desires his compliments to [redacted] [redacted] Hawkstone. [redacted] well on the [redacted] ultimo. I am,

" Yours [redacted] affectionately,

" R. H."

Fully aware of the consequences of quotations from private letters of officers in English newspapers, he added, with his usual caution, "Do not allow the contents of this letter to appear in public:" and well, indeed, had it been for the British leader's satisfaction, if all the officers of his army and their friends had possessed similar prudence. That prudence in every respect was fully estimated: and with regard to his movements at this time, Lord Wellington wrote to him:—"I am convinced that whatever you decide upon will be right. I recommend to you, however, to proceed with great caution in respect to intelligence transmitted to you by the Marquis de la Romana and all the Spanish officers. It is obvious that there is nothing they wish for so much as to involve our troops in their operations, which could lead to no advantage, and might end in the loss of every thing." To this General Hill was quite alive; and the account he sent to his Lordship, proved his interview with Romana to have been conducted with equal sagacity and good feeling. What he said corresponded entirely with the views of his chief; yet his bearing was so courteous, that Romana, though his request was declined, manifested no resentment. The Marquis was much respected by those who co-operated with him, and showed every possible civility to British officers. Nevertheless, it had been reported to Lord Wellington that Captain Cotton had been insulted at Badajoz. The captain's report, however, to General Hill completely exculpates Romana:—"In reply to your inquiries relative to whether the people of Badajoz insulted me when I was sent there by your orders,

I have the honour to acquaint you, that on the evening of the day on which I arrived I went to the public Alameda, and ■■■ people, who were at the entrance and on the walls, certainly did hiss, and otherwise expressed disapprobation: but it was momentary; and nothing could exceed the civility and marked attention of the Marquis Romana and all his staff during the time I was there the first time, and also the last time you sent me there. The circumstance never occurred a second time." But O'Donnell and his staff were not satisfied, although, as Lord Wellington observed in a letter to General Hill, both he and Ballesteros had recently had the advantage of his assistance, and were "thereby saved from being destroyed by the enemy."

May passed off without any incident of importance. At the end of the month General Hill wrote us follows:—

" My dear Sister,

" Portalegre, May 29, 1810.

" I have nothing new to communicate to you. The armies remain nearly in the same situation as when I wrote last. The French, however, are strong, and Massena is arrived to take the command of that corps destined to attack Portugal, and which is said to be upwards of 80,000. * * * Our troops are very healthy, and every thing in the best order.

" I had a letter from Cadiz this day of the 13th. The enemy in that neighbourhood is supposed to be about 15,000 or 16,000—too weak to do ■■■ than invest the place, and keep the garrison shut up. The Spaniards there, as well as in other quarters, do very little, and do [not] ■■■ to consider themselves ■ the principals in the cause. The stories you see in the papers respecting Romana's march to Seville are all nonsense. It is true that the French occasionally quit that part of the country, upon which small parties of Spaniards enter it, but very prudently retire from it ■ the return of the French.

■      *      *      *      *      *

“ Ever yours most affectionately,
 = R. H.”

Lieutenant Clement Hill, on the 5th of June, thus described their situation : —

“ We are perfectly quiet here, and have no more immediate prospect of being disturbed than we have had ever since we came. It appears something was expected to be done in the North a few days ago, but we since hear that all is again quiet. We have been so long in a state of uncertainty, that every one appears tired of conjecturing what the instructions of the French are; and, from all accounts, they are still more tired of the kind of war they are carrying on. They are kept almost constantly marching, and harassed by small parties of the Spaniards. The German troops in their service, and some few French, take every opportunity they can of deserting. There is scarcely a day that some do not come into Badajos; and I understand it is the same in the North. You will have seen that General Massena calls himself king of Portugal, and intends having the honour of conquering this country. Whether he is really serious in making the attempt before Spain is subdued, I suppose a short time will show, as also what we are to do in the event. The army are all in high health, and fit for any thing, and the French, I ■ sure, will not be very anxious to meet them. We heard from Tom yesterday: he is very well; and the Marshal says his regiment is in high order.      *      *      *      *      *      We thought our rainy season was at an end, but it began again a few days ago. Yesterday, the King's birth-day, it rained almost all day, and was as cold as ever it is ■ that time in England - - so much so, that we found a fire comfortable. We hear nothing of going into camp. The country is now in the highest beauty: I wish I could transplant some of the orange-groves to Hawkstone. We have had many days for a wolf-hunt, but have always been prevented by rain."

On the 24th of June, the report of certain of the enemy induced Lord Wellington to write to General Hill:—"I conclude that you will have moved across the Tagus, and I shall immediately send you information and instruction respecting your position, &c." It, however, became unnecessary that the river should be crossed; and the Marquis de la Romana arrived at General Hill's quarters on the 27th, on his way to pay a visit to Lord Wellington. The 2d of July, being post-night for Lisbon, Lieutenant Hill was deputed to write to his sister instead of the General, who was too much engaged. "I believe," he observed, "we have been two weeks without sending you any news from these parts, for the best reason, having none to send." "You must," he proceeded, "of course be expecting interesting accounts of this army. It is certainly very extraordinary that we have so long remained quiet: however, we continue to have no immediate prospect of being otherwise. Both this and the French army are much as they have so long been, the latter certainly not daring to come near us, nor is there any probability of going to them. We heard yesterday of the bombardment of Ciudad Rodrigo having commenced. It is not thought likely that it will hold out long; but the Spaniards often fight longer than they expected, when they get behind a wall. Till the French get possession of that fortress, it is not probable they will make any attempt on this country; and must wait with patience to know what their intentions are. " ■ * * * * * I can ■■■■■ for Rowland and myself never being in better health. The weather is warm, but ■■■■ seasoned to the climate."

The day previous to the date of this letter Lord Wellington had received intercepted French letters, which acquainted him with the orders of Bonaparte to Regnier; which were " to cross the Tagus at Alcantara, and to manœuvre, in conjunction with Massena, on the right bank of that river." His Lordship had some doubt if this order would be executed; if it was, General Hill's directions were to cross the Tagus at Villa Velha, leaving a portion of Fauc's cavalry on the left bank. " If, however," said Lord Wellington four days afterwards, " the second corps should remain in Estremadura, it is desirable that you should, without loss of time, co-operate with the Marquis de la Romana, in an effort to dislodge Regnier from Estremadura, during such time as may be necessary to collect such parts of the harvest as may be required for the formation of magazines." His principal restriction was from crossing the Guadiana; which Romana, whom he expected to see shortly ■■■ his return from visiting Lord Wellington at Alverca, did not like. In reference to this, his Lordship wrote to General Hill, " You will observe that I have put this point, 'it is desirable' that you should not cross the Guadiana. This only expresses my opinion; but you ■■■ the spot must be the best judge whether you ■■■ effect your object without crossing that river." On the 9th, Lord Wellington again instructed the General relative to crossing the Tagus, and the proposed ■■■ pedition into Estremadura; the letter also conveyed intelligence that Ciudad Rodrigo still held out: but on the 11th another was written, to say that it had surrendered by capitulation at six o'clock the night before. "The breach was open, and the French army were about to enter, when they offered terms of capitulation, which were accepted." On the 13th, Regnier showed symptoms of an intention to cross the Tagus; and General Hill immediately apprized Lord Wellington of this intelligence. He stated that he should, "in consequence, incline to his left, and hold every thing prepared to cross at Villa Velha, if he found him serious in crossing the river." He also wrote to Romana the same day; and the next received a letter from the Marquis in English, and written with his own hand. How the worthy Spaniard picked up enough of our language to write as he did, is quite a marvel.

"Dear Sir,

"Badajoz, 14 July, 1810.

"It is no doubt that the enemy is crossing the tagus at the points you have the goodness to inform me, and consequently i have not other to say to you that if you deem convenient to make a movement, for my part i am ready to support them. i have ordered to Genl. Odonell to move towards Alenteira.

"I have the honour to subjoin a copy of a letter send by Genl. Odonell, wich i pray to you to forward His Excy<sup>t</sup> Lord Wellington.

"On the side of Seville no was a movement of the enemy. Rumour spread yesterday that he began his retreat towards Sierra Morena, but that deserve confirmation.

"I have the honour to remain, with the highest esteem,

"Your most humble servant,

"M<sup>os</sup>. ROMANA.

" I fear that Ciudad Rodrigo ■ surrendered, but I pray to you ■ conceal that, whatever I have ■ the least intelligence of this success."

The plans of General Hill, consequent on his information respecting Regnier's movements, were entirely approved at head quarters; and on the 15th he set off to Apalhañ, to be ready to act on either side of the Tagus. On the 19th the civil Marquis wrote him another English letter: —

" Dear Sir,

" Badajoz, 19 de Julio, 1810.

" I have the honour to inform to you that after the latest reports of banks of Tagus, it appears that the whole Regnier's corps had crossed this river, and are in movement towards Placentia and Ceria. I expected to-day the reports from Truxillo, and will be not a loss for time in sending to you the notice. two thousand inf<sup>ry</sup> and 300 cavalry were laying the 16 at Caneaveral.

" I am, with the highest degree of esteem and regard,

" Your most faithful servant,

" M<sup>o</sup>. DE LA ROMANA.

" Lieut.-Gen. R. Hill."

At the beginning of August, after some days of much anxiety, and great display of military skill, General Hill dated from Sazedas: —

" Sazedas, ■■ Castello Branco,

" August 4. 1810.

" My dear Sister,

" Clement has, I know, been writing to you by this day's post; and if he has told you every thing that has been done of late, he has given you a tolerably long letter. Hitherto I have been fortunate enough ■ be ■■ of the enemy's ■■ movements, and to anticipate Lord Wellington's wishes. I trust and ■■ will end well. I ■■ only say that every seems anxious to do duty; and have every confidence in his chief, who has a difficult play: the time, I am sure he will not risk too much. My situation at this moment is a good one; the position is strong; and if I cannot maintain it, I can get out of it, the country in my rear being mountainous, and the passes few and easily defended.

“ One of my Portuguese cavalry regiments engaged with the enemy’s cavalry yesterday. I have not received a report of what was done, but it is certain the French fled, leaving sixteen prisoners, and twelve dead. I believe the Portuguese were superior in numbers to the French; it is, however, the first affair they have had, and will have the best effect. Deserters come in daily, and represent the French army to be tired of the war: that, however, is of little consequence so long as Bonaparte is not. Kind remembrances to Sir John and all friends.

“ I remain most affectionately yours,

Truly did he say that he had anticipated the wishes of his chief, for the day after the date of this letter Lord Wellington wrote to him: “ It appears to me that the disposition which you have made of your corps will answer perfectly.” Regnier’s whole body of cavalry had crossed the Tagus, and had become troublesome to General Hill’s outposts in the flat country in his front. On the 8th he received a letter from the Frenchman relative to the exchange of an officer, in which he coolly says, “ Je n’ai jamais été assez près de vous pour proposer un échange.” He had approached who was quite ready to encounter him at the proper moment, and from whom he must have wished himself farther off before the next month elapsed, as will be seen in the sequel. Regnier his letter "Zarza is Mayor;" but Lord Wellington, with his usual caution, remarked to General Hill, "When you send your answer, do not date where your head quarters are;" though there little fear of his giving his opponent any gratuitous intelligence. On the 17th he was again in the receipt of information from his Lordship, by the hands of Lord Clinton, to the effect that the enemy had broken ground before Almeida, and that he himself should "strike a blow" if he had the opportunity. Lord Clinton found General Hill occupying a small chapel by the road side; and as his strictness of discipline and character for integrity had attracted the peasantry, he was enabled to spread before his noble visitor bread, milk, honey, eggs, poultry, and excellent country wine. Men who had lived on coarse beef and hard biscuit for a long time, felt the full luxury of such supplies. The General had the pleasure of transmitting to head quarters, by Lord Clinton, an account of a successful attack upon a detachment of the enemy's cavalry, which had been reported to him by General Fane having been made by a squadron of cavalry, consisting of a troop of the 4th Portuguese cavalry and one troop of the 13th British dragoons. Amongst the prisoners of this party was the man with the horrible countenance, mentioned by Major Moyle Sherer in his Recollections of the Peninsula. Still nothing of any moment occurred; and the General himself thus described the posture of affairs:—

"My dear Sister,

"Saxidas, August 21. 1810.

"I am sending letters to Lisbon, and will therefore write you a few lines to let you know that every thing is going on well, one ■■■■ anxious to do ■■■■ duty; and ■■■■ have every confidence in ■■■■ chief, who ■■■■ difficult ■■■■ play: ■■■■ the ■■■■ time, I ■■■■ ■■■■ will not risk too much. My situation ■■■■ this moment is ■■■■ good one; the position is strong: ■■■■ if I ■■■■ I cannot maintain it, I ■■■■ get ■■■■ of it, the country in my ■■■■ being mountainous, and the passes few and easily defended.

•            •            •            •            •

■ One of my Portuguese cavalry regiments ■■■■ engaged with the enemy's cavalry yesterday. I have not received ■■■■ report of what ■■■■ done, but it is certain the French fled, leaving sixteen prisoners, and twelve dead. I believe the Portuguese were superior in numbers to the French; it is, however, the first affair they have had, and will have the best effect. Deserters come in daily, and represent the French army to be tired of the war; that, however, is of little consequence so long as Bonaparte is not. Kind remembrance to Sir John and all friends.

“ I remain most affectionately yours,

Truly did he say that he had anticipated the wishes of his chief, for the day after the date of this letter Lord Wellington wrote to him: “ It appears to me that the disposition which you have made of your corps will answer perfectly.” Regnier's whole body of cavalry had crossed the Tagus, and had become troublesome to General Hill's outposts in the flat country in his front. On the 8th he received a letter from the Frenchman relative to the exchange of ■■■■ officer, in which he coolly says, “ Je n'ai jamais été assez près de vous pour vous proposer ■■■■ échange.” He had approached one who ■■■■ quite ready to encounter him at the proper moment, and from whom he must have wished himself farther off before the next month had elapsed, as will be seen in the sequel. Regnier dated his letter "Zarza ■ Mayor;" but Lord Wellington, with his usual caution, remarked to General Hill, "When you send your answer, do not date where your head quarters are;" though there ■ little fear of his giving his opponent any gratuitous intelligence. On the 17th he was again in the receipt of information from his Lordship, by the hands of Lord Clinton, to the effect that the enemy had broken ground before Almeida, and that he himself should ■ "strike ■ blow" if he had the opportunity. Lord Clinton found General Hill occupying ■ small chapel by the road side; and as his strictness of discipline and character for integrity had attracted the peasantry, he was enabled to spread before his noble visitor bread, milk, honey, eggs, poultry, and excellent country wine. Men who had lived on coarse beef and hard biscuit for a long time, felt the full luxury of such supplies. The General had the pleasure of transmitting to head quarters, by Lord Clinton, an account of ■ successful attack upon a detachment of the enemy's cavalry, which had been reported to him by General Fane as having been made by a squadron of cavalry, consisting of a troop of the 4th Portuguese cavalry and one troop of the 13th British dragoons. Amongst the prisoners of this party ■ the ■ with the horrible countenance, mentioned by Major Moyle Sherer in his Recollections of the Peninsula. Still nothing of any moment occurred; and the General himself thus described the posture of affairs:—

"My dear Sister,

"Bazadae, August 21. 1810.

"I ■ sending letters ■ Lisbon, and will therefore write you a few lines ■ let you know that ■ are going on well, and that your three brothers in this part of the world are in perfect health. There is nothing very particular in this quarter. Regnier continues in my front, with his quarters at Zarza Mayor. I have had frequent communications with him: and we are very civil to each other in words go. I sent an officer to him the day before yesterday. He dined with the General, who was exceedingly polite. The French did not seem at all sanguine upon the subject of the war, but, on the contrary, talked of being heartily tired of their present circumstances; complained of never being quiet; and said they had heard from France. Deserters were in almost every day; three arrived this morning. They were in general Germans, and all agree in saying the French are heartily tired of the unjust war in the Peninsula. The peasants murder them wherever they are found in small parties; and no communication can be kept up through the country without strong guards, which is very harassing to the troops. Muzena has commenced the siege of Almeida, and Lord Wellington moved a few miles nearer to him yesterday."

"We are in hourly expectation of the packet from England. Kind remembrance to Sir John and all dear friends."

"Yours ever most affectionately,

"R. H."

On the 28th he informed his friends at Hawkstone, "Nothing very particular has occurred during the last week. The enemy are making formidable preparations for the siege of Almeida, which place, I fear, cannot hold out very long; and when the enemy have taken possession of that place, probably they will commence their operations upon Portugal." The next day Lord Wellington wrote to him, "There is no doubt but that the place has fallen;" and he added, "Observe Regnier well; his movements will be the clue to everything else: expect that he will move to-morrow." On the 1st of September General Hill was informed by his Lordship that the magazine ■ Almeida was blown up, which destroyed the town. Regnier's movements still remained doubtful; and on the 5th Lord Wellington's communication ■ thus expressed: "Nothing has occurred this day worthy of attention. I rely upon your prudence and discretion not to engage yourself in any affair of which the result can be at all doubtful. Retire gradually if you find the enemy threatening you in too great force; and let me hear from you constantly. If we can avoid any accident before we all join, I have confidence of our final success." On the 12th General Hill quitted Sazedas, which he announced in the following terms to his chief: —

"My Lord,

"Sazedas, September 12. 1810.

"From the intelligence I have already sent your Lordship, and that which I now enclose, it is pretty certain that the whole of Regnier's corps have marched to the northward, and that ■ part of them have already reached Guarda. Therefore, adverting to your Lordship's instructions of the 31st of August, I have prepared to cross the Zezere, ■ therein directed. The British infantry and my artillery will be at Sabrera Formosa this evening; and until I find it necessary to proceed from that place, I shall continue Le Cor at Fondão, and General Fane at Castello Branco. Should the enemy return to this part of the frontier, I ■ in as good ■ situation to defend the passes from Sabrera Formosa as from Sazedas, ■ your Lordship observes."

"I have, &c.

"Viscount Wellington, K. B.

"R. HILL.

"&c. &c. &c."

Sazedas was left with regret by the household of the General; but they had given up all hope of coming in contact with Regnier for some time. "I do not wonder," observed Lieutenant Hill, in writing to his sister, "at your anxiety about us; but I wish you would think no more of our danger than we do. To be sure, as Mr. Moore says in his Almanack, 'when armies are in the field, a battle may be expected,' and such an event may take place; but I assure you we have no more prospect of it than we have had for some time, nor so much, for the enemy certainly show no disposition to come near us." When General Hill arrived at Sazedas, the village was completely deserted, except by the priest, their landlord, but the inhabitants soon found out that they might return in confidence of protection, and even profit by the sale of provisions; so that a forsaken and desolate place became speedily converted into a luxurious market, supplied not only from the neighbourhood but from Lisbon itself.

The enemy's whole army had, by the 17th, entered the valley of the Mondego, and on that day General Hill was directed "to collect his corps at Espinhal, &c., and remain there till further orders." He arrived at Espinhal on the 20th, and was at Foz d'Aronce on the 21st. Lord Wellington occupied the Convent of Busaco — a formidable position. From the lofty summit of that mountain he bade defiance to the gathering hosts of the veterans of France, — firm in his purpose, clear in his calculations, and full of confidence that a day of reward for his unexampled patience was in his hand. Nearly 70,000 of Napoleon's conquering troops were a fearful array, commanded by three Marshals of France, — their chief, Massena himself, whose life had been perpetual. But Wellington had counted the cost of being attacked by such assailants in his stronghold, and had decided that the loss should not be his, but theirs. The eventful moment was daily approaching. He wished to have an interview with General Hill, but neither could quit their post. On the 24th the former wrote from Busaco, — “I was not able to go to you as I intended;” and the communication of the latter was as follows: —

“My Lord,                               “Vila Chem, September, 25, 11 P. M.

“It was my wish to have waited on your Lordship, but the circumstances of our present situation will, I trust, plead my apology for not having done so. My brother is the bearer of this, and will take charge of any commands your Lordship may send me.”

“I was in front this day, with General Fane, posting his cavalry, and returned by the bridge of Val del Espino. I cannot learn that anything but a few parties of cavalry had crossed the Mondego, and they appear to have gone back. This is confirmed by Captain Cox, who has joined General Fane.”

“I have had several reports of firing being heard this day on the left of General Leith, and am anxious to know the result of it.”

“I have, &c.

“Lord Viscount Wellington, K. B.

“R. HILL.

&c. &c. &c.”

A few hours after this letter was penned its writer moved the Mondego, and led his gallant soldiers up the steep mountain of Busaco, where he quickly disposed them on the right of Lord Wellington’s army, in order of battle. "Our position," says Major Sherer, "extended nearly eight miles along this mountainous and rocky ridge, and the ground which formed, inclining with a slope to our rear, most admirably concealed both the disposition and numbers of our force." At the foot of this position reposed that evening the forces of Portugal, who were wont at sunset to gather in circles round their officers, and chant forth their vespers. Their eyes now first beheld the seventy thousand invaders of their fatherland — an appalling spectacle, as the rays of the setting sun reflected from their arms. Only twenty-five thousand Portuguese were about to engage with them in their first great combat; but they were aided by an equal number of British, commanded by Wellington and Hill. The dawn of the 27th ushered in the decisive day. While yet the grey mist rested on their mountain couch, the enemy came on. The watchful picquets had heard their preparation, and the British were standing silently to arms. Regnier with two columns, and Ney with three, rushed up against the convent, and the well-known battle of Busaco ensued. The whole corps of General Hill was thrown into open column, and moved to its left in the most perfect order and in double quick time. The effort of Massena directed against the right of Lord Wellington, which he expected to turn; and, ignorant of the presence of Generals Hill and Leith, he imagined that his troops were engaging with its extremity. To the surprise of the French, the forces under these officers suddenly emerged from their previous concealment, and halted at the spot whence the brave 74th had just driven back ■ column of the enemy, and ■■ retiring in line, regular, compact, invincible. The only signs of recent encounter were their colours ragged with the shot of their opponents. Soon after the British Commander and his staff galloped to the spot. "Hill," said he, in ■ decisive tone, "if they attempt this point again, give them ■ volley and charge bayonets, but do not let your people follow them too far down the hill." But they had had quite enough. Regnier ■■ found what it was to be near the British; and the French, instead of returning to the onslaught, occupied the remainder of the day in removing their wounded; and some of them actually shook hands with the English soldiers, as they slaked their common thirst from ■ narrow rivulet that ■■ at the bottom of the hill. The Portuguese behaved valiantly; while on Marshal Beresford and the English officers, amongst whom was Colonel Thomas Noel Hill, rested the high honour of their discipline and military bearing. General Hill's division was, as has been seen, ready in the exact place where it was needed, but was not engaged; still his presence rendered essential service. Every other general's conduct also, including the names of Pietou, Palk, Cole, Crawford, and Leith, was worthy of their leader, their country, and the cause in which they fought. The night which succeeded this memorable day, afforded to the victorious occupants of the mountain scenes of indescribable grandeur. The whole country beneath them glowed with countless fires, showing thousands of shadowy forms of men and horses, mingled with piles of arms glittering amidst the flames. These gradually subsided into glowing patches of red embers gemming the black bosom of the earth, and all seemed to threaten another mighty conflict at the dawn of day. The men under Hill kept in their full accoutrements, and each with his musket by his side, front and rear ranks, head to head, lay upon the mountain, awaiting the morn, and expecting that the assailable gorge near at hand would be the point of attack. This expectation was not realized. Towards evening the French moved with the design of cutting off the allies from Oporto, and bringing on an action where the ground was more in their favour. Lord Wellington, foreseeing this intention, withdrew from the Serra de Busaco, and General Hill, crossing the Mondego, marched on San Miguel, where he endeavoured to ascertain the movements of the French. "If you find," said Lord Wellington, "that the enemy cross the Mondego, send Le Cor immediately to Arguil, and depend upon my being with you, with the whole army, in a few hours. If they try our left instead of our right, I shall give you instructions for movements corresponding with ours." To this letter, dated "Tormes, 29th September," he thus replied:—

"St. Miguel, 30th Sept., 1810, 11 A. M.

"My Lord,

"I have received your Lordship's letter of the 29th from Tormes, and have issued orders accordingly. By the enclosed reports you will see that the enemy had not shown the river yesterday, and that the bridge of Talara may be destroyed if thought necessary.

"I have, &c.,

"R. HILL.

"P. S. The movements of yesterday were well executed, the guns got off without any material injury."

In consequence of his anticipations respecting the enemy's proceedings, Lord Wellington wrote to General Hill, "Your movements therefore become a subject of some anxiety to me. I understand half, possibly the whole of your infantry will be at Santarem this day. Everything that arrives at Santarem this day should march in the morning to Azambuja. Any part of your corps which makes a short march into Santarem to-morrow morning must move on to Cartaxo, and the whole must move early the next morning upon Villa Franca." To this and another letter of the same import he replied the next day from Santarem:—"I hope your Lordship will have received the letter I wrote last night, in answer to yours of yesterday morning, informing your Lordship that the whole of the infantry and artillery under my command had arrived here yesterday, with my intention to pass Azambuja this day at least. I will, however, halt on the Villa Franca side of that place. I shall be ready to proceed further if your Lordship should deem it necessary." The next communication from Lord Wellington informed him, — "Your whole corps, even including that part of Fane's cavalry, which will not leave Santarem until to-morrow morning, will be in good time." On the afternoon of the 8th they entered Alhandra, about four leagues from Lisbon. From this place, on the 12th, Lieutenant Clement sent home the following account of himself and his brothers:—"You will probably before you get this have heard of the army having fallen back to near Lisbon, which, I doubt, people in Eng'and will be disappointed to find, after the victory ■ Busaco. It certainly ■ always Lord W.'s intention to do so in the event of the enemy advancing in force, as of course the farther they ■ drawn ■ the more difficulty they will meet with when defeated, which most certainly they will be if they are mad enough to attack ■ in ■ strong position, which extends from this place, on the Tagus, to Mafra, on the sea, the whole country between which is fortified; and I believe Lord W. has ■ as many troops ■ they have. He ■ quite confident of ■ They made a show of following the army during our retreat; but I believe it is not yet ascertained whether their whole force is come on. Our giving up so much of the country has certainly distressed the inhabitants dreadfully. They are all ordered, on pain of death, to leave their houses and to destroy all the property they cannot carry away with them; and very few having means of transport, you may imagine what misery it causes. But they all submit with the greatest patience, knowing it has the desired effect of completely annoying the French. Our post is at this place, about eighteen miles from Lisbon. We are in every respect well off, get all the good things from Lisbon, and live in ■ palace. We ■ both quite well. Tom is not far from us; but I have not seen him lately. We hear almost every day of his being well. I hope you received my letter, [written] ■ ■ I had ■ opportunity after the battle of Busaco. Rowland and I ■ not much in the fight, but had the pleasure of seeing the French get ■ drubbing, in which Tom's regiment helped. Marshal Beresford and Lord W. have not forgot his [REDACTED] amongst others that are mentioned." The strong position here alluded to was on the lines of Torres Vedras. Lord Wellington had carried [REDACTED] these celebrated works silently but perseveringly, for the defence of the seat of government and capital of Portugal, that he might there achieve the deliverance of [REDACTED] nation, and crown his [REDACTED] and the British [REDACTED] with imperishable honour. At this time the rains had commenced, and the men suffered much from the want of tents, which had been ordered, but had not arrived; on which Lord Wellington observed, dryly, "They swear they have been sent from Lisbon." General Hill found time for [REDACTED] short letter, descriptive of his position:—

"My dear Sister,

"Alhambra, Oct. 13. 1810.

"The enemy, finding he could make [REDACTED] impression at Busaco by force, endeavoured to get round our left, which obliged Lord W. to fall back. We now occupy [REDACTED] position about 20 miles in front of Lisbon; it is strong, but rather too extensive for our numbers. The enemy followed [REDACTED] pretty close upon our march, and is now immediately in our front, and I have [REDACTED] doubt will soon bring matters to a crisis. We [REDACTED] confident of success, and I trust you will [REDACTED] receive favourable accounts. My post extends from the Tagus about four miles to the left, and I am, as you may suppose, [REDACTED] good deal occupied; but hearing there is an opportunity of sending letters, I will not miss it. I thank Sir John for his very kind letter, which [REDACTED] will answer in a few days. * * * * * Tom and his regiment distinguished themselves much in the late action [REDACTED] Busaco.

"Most affectionately and truly yours,

"R. II."

On the 14th the general's old friend Regnier was [REDACTED] him again, of which he apprised Lord Wellington. "I have," he wrote on the 15th, "to inform your Lordship that the enemy reconnoitred us on the high ground in front of our position yesterday about noon, having obliged our picquets to fall back. His force appeared to consist of about three battalions of infantry and some squadrons of cavalry. An officer and a large suite were observed in front." After mentioning the successful result of some skirmishing, he continued, "A prisoner, brought in late yesterday evening, states that the officer who reconnoitred our Regnier, and that the whole of his corps is in our front, the main body being near Villa Franca, where our armed boats observe considerable smoke and the appearance of encampments."

During the remainder of this month, several changes of position took place in consequence of the marches of the enemy, who retired without venturing on any attack, completely foiled by the strength of the lines and the skill of their opponents. On the 27th, by desire of his gallant brother, Lieutenant Hill wrote home from Alhandra:—"We have now not the least idea of their attacking us here, and they must give up all thoughts of getting Lisbon. I really believe they never have been more deceived than in this greater scrape than they are at present, and they will have some difficulty in getting out of it. They cannot remain near us much longer without being starved, as they have very few supplies here, and the Spaniards and Portuguese are intercepting all from their rear; in fact, part of their army has already begun to retreat. We are all three quite well. Tom is about ten miles from here: he made [REDACTED] [REDACTED] morning call yesterday, and to-day [REDACTED] expect him to dine and sleep. The people in Lisbon have now quite got rid of their alarm, and the ladies begin to come up by water to look at the French. Our house is near the river, and Rowland is just gone down to do the civil thing to the Admiral's family, who [REDACTED] [REDACTED] up [REDACTED] [REDACTED] party of pleasure, [REDACTED] he intended writing himself." The worthy Romana had once more joined the allied forces in front of Lisbon with [REDACTED] considerable detachment of Spaniards, and Lord Wellington found him friendly and attentive. The subjoined letter of General Hill to his father affords very interesting information:—

" Sobral Peguena, near Alhandra.

Nov. 3. 1810.

" My dear Father,

" Clement, I know, wrote by the last packet, and I sent a few lines the week before. When I wrote, I expected the enemy would not have remained many hours without attacking us; but not having done so at that time, I think it [REDACTED] pretty certain they will not meddle with us now, [REDACTED] least in [REDACTED] present position, and with their present force. It is difficult to foresee the result of this contest: it is, however, evident the enemy did not expect the resistance he has met with from the Portuguese troops; indeed, an intercepted letter from Bonaparte to Massena shows that he holds the Portuguese very cheap. I have not [REDACTED] the letter, but know that it gives Massena a tolerably [REDACTED] statement of the British force, and directs him to attack it, making [REDACTED] mention of the Portuguese; and adding, that with his 65,000 [REDACTED] he [REDACTED] [REDACTED] to drive the British 30,000 into the sea. At the [REDACTED] time, he directs Massena to press [REDACTED] Massena [REDACTED] accordingly endeavoured to obey his Emperor's commands, [REDACTED] foolishly attacked the strong position of Busaco; and although the battle at that place was by no means so desperate as the battle of Talavera, yet the enemy's loss was considerable; and finding he could not force the position, he turned it, and obliged Lord Wellington to fall back to this line, where he has now left the sea, and is right here on the Tagua. On the march, Massena did press on as he could, and I verily believe he and his army thought they were off to sea, and consequently were a good deal disappointed when he halted here to meet him, in which situation I thought he would have attacked me. He has, however, given me much time, that I am now twice as strong, from the works constructed, as I was when I first arrived; therefore, as I said before, I do not think he will have any thing to say to me here at present. The enemy give out that they expect considerable reinforcements; and, although I believe there will be none near, yet I dare say Bonaparte will, when he finds he has not sufficient troops, send more. Many are of opinion that Massena will not be able to keep his ground, and must either quit the country or surrender. I am not quite so sanguine as they are; but, at the present time, I think he is rather in a scrape if he does not get more troops soon. Clement and Thomas are quite well. The former writes by this day's packet, as I told him I thought I should not have time. I return you a thousand thanks for your kind attention to my affairs. Believe me, my dear Father, to be your ever obliged and dutiful

“ R. HILL.

“ Sir John Hill, Bart.”

Another letter also explains the proceedings of the two armies.

“ My dear Sister,

“ Sobral Peguená, near Alhandra,

“ November 10. 1810.

“ On this day week I wrote to Sir John, since which time nothing of consequence has occurred. The two armies remain as they were, the British in the position I mentioned in my last, with the right on the Tagua, and the left on the sea near Torres Vedras, a distance, probably, of about five miles. The French advanced regiments are close to us; that is, some of them not more than a mile and a half from the place where I am now writing, with the sentries within musket shot of each other. In this situation we have been for the month, and I dare say it will appear rather extraordinary when I tell you that we are perfectly good neighbours, and we think of molesting each other. On the contrary, I have been obliged to put a stop to the intimacy which was going on. It was by means of the soldiers of each army getting grapes out of the same vineyard, water from the well, and asking each other to drink wine. Indeed, I know of several instances, though not quite correct, of officers sending to Lisbon for boots and shirts for their friends at outposts. By this intercourse, however, we have procured some information. The French certainly were tired and dissatisfied with the war, and say that Massena's intelligence must have been very bad. They, however, hold out; at least, are told that reinforcements are coming to them, and that they shall be able to keep their ground until they arrive, and will then drive us into the sea. The only reinforcements I have heard of are about 10,000, said to be on the march. It was supposed by some that the French could not remain where they are for want of provisions; it is, however, a difficult matter to starve a Frenchman; and although the destruction and misery have been very complete in the great towns, and on the line of the great roads, yet I fear the Portuguese, with all their boasting, have been very deficient in the essential point of clearing the country we have left of its provisions and cattle. * * * I trust the day will come for all to our dear friends at Hawkstone. God bless you all!

"I am,

"Yours ever most affectionately,

"R. H.

"Miss Hill."

A third letter succeeded the other two.

"My dear Sister,

"Villa Nova, Nov. 1810.

"On the morning of the 15th, at daylight, we descried that the enemy retreated during the night. They have continued their march to their rear, since followed by our army. What the real situation of the enemy is I cannot pretend to say; it is, however, the general opinion that they are going to quit Portugal. It is certain the French army has suffered a good deal in this country, — what with losses sustained at Buzaco, the desertions, sickness, and want of comforts. I cannot, however, help thinking they are not in that state to justify their going off altogether. Some of their troops were in Santarem last night, and I dare say are gone from thence this morning. Our light troops were close after them, and have taken several prisoners, about a hundred in all, in general, weakly sick men, which shows that the enemy is rather in a hurry, when they do not wait to protect their sick.

“I am going to cross the Tagus this day with my corps, and shall move up the south of the river towards Abrantes. I saw Tom yesterday. Kind remembrances to all.

“I remain,

“Most affectionately yours,

“R. HILL.

“Miss Hill.”

General Hill had been instructed to cross the Tagus, but Lord Wellington wrote to him on the 19th, to say that a letter from General Fane had almost induced him to believe that he had made a mistake in sending him over that river at all. He added, “I am certain that you should proceed no further up that river than Chamusca at present, with the head of your corps.” Accordingly his next letter is dated “Chamusca, Nov. 23d, 5. p. M.” It states, “I wrote on Saturday last, and told you that the enemy had retired from the front of our former position. They continued retreating till they arrived at Santarem, where they are in considerable force, and from whence I think it will be difficult to drive them if they were inclined to remain. My corps passed the Tagus on the 17th with the view of recrossing at Abrantes, should the enemy retire into Spain by Castello Branco. They either intend to retire by that road, or by Espinhal and the Ponte Marcella, or to remain in the country till they get reinforcements. I am inclined to think the latter, though the former is the general opinion. Clement has of course told you our present position, which at this moment is very safe, having the Tagus between us and the enemy."

Towards the middle of December, General Hill was obliged to retire to Lisbon by a severe attack of fever, which at first gave hopes of speedy abatement. His illness had been communicated to his family by his brother, and he wrote himself on feeling somewhat better.

"My dear Sister,

"Lisbon, December 15. 1810.

"Clement will have informed you of my having been indisposed. The feverish attack which I had is by no means unusual in the interior of the country, and particularly on the south bank of the Tagus, where we have been lately. The fever is seldom attended with fatal consequences, and a change of air to the neighbourhood of the sea, has almost always an instantaneous effect for the better. I was therefore removed to Lisbon, and since my arrival here have been daily recovering. I have just been out riding for nearly two hours, and do not feel the least fatigued; on the contrary, I feel myself better. I have received your last kind letter. Nothing, I am sure, would give me greater pleasure than to obtain permission to visit Shropshire, which, if I were to ask, I am sure I could procure; but under present circumstances, in my mind, it would not be right to think of it, provided my health will admit of my returning to my post. Surely we in this country cannot long remain in a state of uncertainty. I do not, however, think the French have sufficient force in Portugal to drive us out of our strong position, nor do I think Lord W. sufficient strength to drive [redacted] out of the country. It appears as if Massena [redacted] waiting either for instructions [redacted] reinforcements. It [redacted] certain that his adjutant-general [redacted] despatched [redacted] Paris about three weeks ago; it is also certain that some small reinforcements, about 4,000, which [redacted] [redacted] the march to Massena, have returned into Spain. I [redacted] now living in Lord W.'s house here. He [redacted] here about [redacted] week ago; he is in high spirits, and seems very confident. He goes out hunting about twice [redacted] week.

* * * * *

We are anxiously expecting the arrival of the next packet from England; its contents [redacted] be very interesting to us, [redacted] [redacted] have heard nothing since the 27th of last month. Kind remembrances to all friends, and believe me, my dear Sister,

"Most affectionately yours,

"R. H."

By the 22d he was so much better, his brother expressed [redacted] hope that in about [redacted] fortnight he would return to his corps at Chamusca. These expectations were not realized, and he could not regain his strength, which he reluctantly acknowledged in writing to his sister.

"My dear Sister,

"Lisbon, [redacted] December, 1810.

"Clement wrote to you by the last packet, and I must send you a few lines by this day's. I find it is much easier to lose one's strength in this country than to regain it. I have not for [redacted] time had the least fever, but I feel the effects of it, and cannot get appetite [redacted] strength. I do, however, hope [redacted] to be better; but if I find I do not recover in this country, I [redacted] leave it. General Fane, who has been all along with me, sails to England in the packet which takes this; he was ill about the time I was, and with nearly the same complaint, but his attack was severer than mine.

"Things [redacted] again becoming interesting in this country. When Massena went from before Albandra, it was generally supposed that he was off altogether. I think I then told you that I thought he would not go far, which turned out to be the case. It now appears to be certain that the whole of the 9th French corps, about 15,000, entered Portugal to reinforce Massena, and that the junction effected, which I think will be in the course of a week, it is probable he will carry into immediate execution one of the following operations — a general attack upon the position before Lisbon, the passage of the Tagus, and the occupation of the province of Alentejo. * * * I fear I shall not be able, at all events, to join the army for a fortnight at least. Excuse this hasty letter, and believe me,

“Most truly yours,

“R. HILL.”

Major-General Stewart filled for a time the post of General Hill, but was extremely desirous that he should himself return to the command. As he was unable to do so, Sir William Beresford crossed the Tagus and took charge of affairs; and the kind letter of Lord Wellington announcing this to General Hill, expressed much anxiety that he might soon resume his situation, but urged him not to attempt it till quite able. He also wrote to him in the most friendly manner, advising frequent change of air; but all was of no avail, and the physicians recommended his going home for a time, to which, in the strong solicitation of Lord Wellington, he became willing to yield, the more especially as he had been visited with a severe attack of jaundice. Accordingly, after a passage of three weeks, he reached Falmouth on the 6th of February, 1811, and at Exeter on the 9th. On the 11th he arrived at Wells on a visit to his uncle, Mr. Tudway. Before he left Exeter he heard of the “sudden death of his friend Romana,” by an officer just returned from Portugal. A very few days in his native country proved the excellence of the advice given him, for he began rapidly to mend, and was very anxious to proceed to Hawkstone, accompanied by Lieutenant Clement Hill and Captain Currie. "I mean," he wrote from Wells, "to go by Bath, and I really have no coat except a uniform one, I believe I must halt there one day for the purpose of getting one made, and to purchase a few necessary articles." Although much better, he was still unable to encounter the evening air, and therefore proposed to take three days in going from Bath to Hawkstone. His arrival was a source of much comfort to his friends, who saw him daily advancing towards a renovated state of health. But he was most anxious to return to the army, which, by the blessing of God on repose and the comforts of home, he was enabled to rejoin in May, almost immediately after Marshal Beresford's desperate battle of Albuera.

CHAPTER VII.

HILL'S ARRIVAL IN THE ARMY. — HE ARRIVES AT HIS QUARTERS. — HIS WELCOME. — EXTRACTS FROM HIS LETTERS. — HIS ACQUAINTANCE WITH THE PRINCE OF ORANGE. — VILLA VIÇOSA. — PORTALEGRE. — LETTERS FROM GENERAL HILL. — PORTUGUESE TROOPS. — GENERAL HILL OPERATES AGAINST GIRARD. — ARRIVAL DE GIRARD. — SURPRISE OF GIRARD. — GENERAL HILL'S RESEMBLANCE. — MARCH OF THE HIGHLANDERS. — PANIC IN THE FRENCH. — PURSUIT ON THE SIERRA DE MONTANCHES. — TRIUMPH OF THE DAY. — ESCAPE OF GIRARD. — PRINCE D'ARENBERG AND OTHER PRISONERS. — LORD WELLINGTON'S SATISFACTION AT HIS ACHIEVEMENT. — RECOMMENDS GENERAL HILL TO THE PRINCE REGENT. — GENERAL HILL'S POPULARITY WITH THE ARMY. — HIS OWN DESCRIPTION OF ARROYO DE MOLINOS. — FLATTERING GRATULATIONS. — CAPTAIN C. HILL TAKES HOME THE DESPATCHES. — HIS RECEPTION IN ENGLAND. — LETTER OF PRINCE D'ARENBERG. — LORD MULGRAVE. — GENERAL HILL PROMISED THE ORDER OF THE BATH. — NEW MOVEMENTS. — ESTREMADURA. — CIUDAD RODRIGO. — GALLANTRY OF COLONEL T. N. HILL. — NEW PLANS. — SPEECH OF THE PRINCE REGENT. — INVESTMENT OF THE ORDER OF THE BATH. — SIR ROWLAND HILL'S REPUGNANCE TO BE CALLED BY HIS NEW TITLE. — SUPPORTERS. — FALL OF BADAJOS. — NEW PROJECTS. —

GENERAL HILL, on reaching the Peninsula, was welcomed by the following letter from Lord Wellington:—

“My dear Hill,

“Elvas, May 27. 1811.

“I am very glad you are returned in good health, and I hope that you shall see me soon.

“You will have heard of events here, which I hope will enable you to obtain possession of Badajos, upon which you are busily employed.

“Believe me, &c.

“WELLINGTON.”

He proceeded at once to head-quarters, and wrote to his sister, to apprise her of his arrival.

“ My dear Sister,

“ Elvas, May 31. 1811.

“ I have the pleasure to acquaint you that after a prosperous journey, I arrived here yesterday, and I have been but one fortnight coming from Spithead to this place, little time has been lost. Indeed, I believe few ever made the voyage and journey in less time. Beresford's battle, which you will have heard of long before this reaches you, has been a bloody one, and as the French retired, we claim the victory, but alas! it has been a dear bought one. When I was in England, and heard that the French had possession of Badajoz, I said I thought I should be in time to see it retaken. The opportunity exists, and the enemy determined to keep it as long as he can, in consequence of which preparations are making to besiege it, and it is the general opinion that it will fall in about ten days. In the mean time, my corps, which I shall have the command of to-morrow, will prevent the enemy from relieving the place. I saw Lord Wellington yesterday, and shall dine with him to-day. He is, as usual, very civil, and expressed pleasure at my return. I assure you, I never felt in better health than at present, and trust I shall continue well. Clement* joins in kind remembrance to Sir John, and all at Hawkstone.

“ I remain,

“ Yours very affectionately,

“ R. H.”

The return of General Hill not only gave pleasure to Lord Wellington, but excited, as is truly stated by Napier, “ the eager rejoicings of the army.” After various movements, which it is not essential to trace, he arrived at “ Torre Moro, a league from Campo Mayor.” On the 20th of June he sent home news to * Mr. Clement Hill was promoted to the rank of captain in April, 1811.

this effect:—"My last letter to you ■■■ from Elvas, ■■■ my way to Almendralejo, to ■■■ the command of my corps, which I did about seventeen days ago. I had scarcely been there ■ week, when accounts from every quarter confirmed what had been for ■■■ time expected, the advance of the French from the North as well as the South towards Badajos, for the purpose of relieving that place, and in doing which they have completely succeeded. Lord Wellington, not wishing to risk a battle to save it, sent orders for me and all the troops in front, to fall back upon the approach of the enemy. We accordingly came here, and ■ the enemy ■■■ bringing all his force towards this point, Lord W. ordered the whole of his army from the North to march in this direction, and to this neighbourhood, where the whole will be assembled in the course of two or three days. The enemy, on their part, have concentrated nearly all their force about Merida, and having gained their first object, the raising of the siege of Badajos, it is thought they will not at present make any further attempt on Portugal." He had, ■ the ■■■ day, been taking ■ long ride with Lord Wellington, and when he ■■■ home, could not help congratulating himself on having had nothing to do with the unsuccessful siege of Badajos. But he perfectly coincided with his chief as to the wisdom of not risking ■ battle in the open plains near that place, "where the enemy ■■■ bringing the whole of his force, and which force in cavalry ■■■ far superior to ours." On the 11th of July he observed, in another letter, "The enemy, having ■■■ completely succeeded in their object of relieving Badajos, and throwing abundant supplies of provisions and ammunition into the place, do not appear desirous, nor, indeed, I ought to say equal to undertake any further operations against ■ at present." Besides, the French had said, in their official papers, that ■ but madmen would continue in the unhealthy spot they then occupied, during the hot months, which being a just remark, he concluded they would retire, and expected Soult ■ going to Seville, and Marmont about to recross the Tagus. The ■ also operated on the mind of Lord Wellington, who marched to Beira, leaving the troops under General Hill cantoned in Alentejo. The Prince of Orange had just joined the army, and General Hill had met him at dinner at head-quarters, when his Serene Highness and himself commenced an acquaintance, which afterwards ripened into mutual esteem and confidence. Soon after, Lieutenant Muckworth, whom the General had taken as his extra aid-de-camp, was made prisoner by the French patrols, but was very well treated by them, and eventually, after a long correspondence, exchanged. This affair, and the nature of his position, are noticed in a letter to Miss Hill, which will preclude the necessity of tracing his movements at any length, during a period comparatively dull.

" Villa Viçosa, August ■ 1811.

" My dear Sister.

" Your letters have duly arrived, and I beg to thank you for all you have been kind enough to write to us. If you received a letter I wrote from Torre de Moro, you will find that my prognostics have in some degree been verified. The French retired to a short distance for the purpose of giving their army a little rest. The army of Portugal, as ■ is called, was in consequence cantoned with its right off Placentia, and left at Truxillo, where they were enjoying the comforts of the towns on that line, when Lord Wellington marched the main part of his force towards Ciudad Rodrigo, where it now is, ■ which I imagine will oblige the French to make a move on some point; but whether it will be directly upon his lordship, or more in this direction, I cannot tell. I do, however, ■ that they are preparing for a march: ■ the same time I do not apprehend they ■ do any thing serious against ■ ■ present. My principal object is to watch the 5th French corps, which is ■ and about Zafrá. It consists of about 10,000 infantry and ■ cavalry. My corps ■ stronger than that. The 5th, however, may be joined by ■ others from Truxillo and Seville.

■ Nothing could exceed Lord W.'s attention to my request respecting Mr. Mackworth; and it has been the means of procuring his release from the hands of the French, where, in justice to ■ enemy, I must say he ■ extremely well treated.

I ■ fully persuaded that if ■ ■ not gone home at the time I did, my health would not have been established; at least, if I may judge from others who were ailing ■ the time I ■ ill, ■ ■ kept lingering in the country without doing duty, and in the end have been obliged to quit.

“ Yours very truly and affectionately,

“ R. H.”

The division of General Hill remained ■ Villa Viçosa till the 3d of September. It is a handsome town, distant about five leagues from Elvas, and there ■ much in the place and its environs to render it very agreeable, particularly the hunting palace and preserves, together with the picturesque rides and walks in the park, which had in former days caused ■ to be a favourite country residence of the royal family. The confidence reposed in our troops brought supplies as usual in the market, and within two miles lay the famous vineyards of Borba, yielding the best wine of Portugal. The Chapel Royal was also an attraction to some of the officers, from the exquisite beauty of the music, which was, however, frequently of a description ill-suited to the sanctuary. Early in September they removed to Portalegre; but nothing of an exciting nature occurred for some time. Three letters of the General give every requisite explanation of his own circumstances, and events affecting the army. The two first were to Miss Hill; the third to his elder brother.

My dear Sister,

Portalegre, Sept. 17. 1811.

"I have nothing particular to communicate to you by this day's post; I will however send you a few lines to tell you we are all well. The enemy are, I think, concentrating their force in the direction of Ciudad Rodrigo, with the intention of preventing Lord W. from meddling with that place, and I should not be surprised if they succeed. The French army is certainly weak and sickly. Marmont is, I am told, assured that he may have reinforcements of 40,000 from France, and he is enabled to draw some of the troops to this side, in consequence of the fall of Tarragona and Figueras, and Soult's success over Blake in Granada. General Castanos and the Spaniards in Galicia have had some advantage over the French. Castanos is in my front, and when you hear so great a name, you will imagine I am well protected by a large army. The following statement of Castanos' force, contained in an intercepted letter from the French General at Merida, to Marmont, is before me, is a pretty correct one:—'Morrillo, commander of the Spanish infantry, and the Count de Penné, commanding the cavalry, in all about 3000 mauvaises troupes armées à Cáceres. Hill, commandant d'une division Anglaise, est entre Vila Viçosa et St. Oña. Castanos, avec sept ou huit cent officiers, et fort peu de soldats, est quartier général ■ Valencia d'Alcantara.' ■ troops at Caceres belong to Castanos; but, as the French say, he has very few soldiers ■ Valencia, not more than two or three hundred."

" My ■ Sister,

" Portalegre, Sept. ■ 1811.

" Clement is gone to Lisbon, and ■ dare say will write ■ ■ Colonel from thence, to thank him for his kindness regarding ■ hounds which have arrived safe and well. Things are becoming interesting again in this country. Lord Wellington ■ a large army in his front, and by an intercepted letter, and the movements of the enemy, ■ ■ not likely ■ be idle this side. The 5th corps has advanced to Merida, and by the above-mentioned intercepted letter it appears that it is to ■ upon me, to prevent our going to Lord Wellington. I do, however, think it probable Lord W. will give up the idea of attacking Ciudad Rodrigo, with which the enemy will for the present be satisfied. Kind ■ memorances to all, and believe me

" Yours very affectionately,

" R. HILL.

" Miss Hill."

" My dear Brother,

" Portalegre, Oct. 1. 1811.

" Circumstances have a good deal changed since I wrote to Maria on this day week. Lord W. was then in a position covering Ciudad Rodrigo, and Marmont ■ ■ his march to relieve it; and the question was, whether Lord Wellington would risk an action to prevent supplies being thrown into it. The question has ■ been decided by his Lordship's declining it; a ■ deemed most advisable, considering the force of the enemy. Lord W. has, in consequence, fallen back towards Sabugal, and yesterday it was supposed the enemy ■ also on their return ■ the quarters from whence they ■ having succeeded in their object of supplying Ciudad Rodrigo. You will perceive from what has happened, that the enemy is not so weak as we were inclined to suppose him to be last ■ when he was running out of Portugal. I am, however, of opinion, that although he probably would have no great objection to meet us in an open country, yet I do not think he sufficiently strong to undertake offensive operations against this country. Therefore, under all circumstances, it strikes me that Marmont will be perfectly satisfied with having gained his object at Ciudad Rodrigo, and that we shall remain for the winter quiet. Next spring will probably decide the campaign in favour of England or France, according to the reinforcements which may arrive to either army. With respect to my situation, I have been rather on the alert the last ten days. Marmont sent a request to the Commander of the 5th French corps, Girard, to march on this side, while I marched upon Ciudad Rodrigo; at the same time telling him that the English had very few troops at Alentejo. Girard, who does not belong to Marmont's force, called the army of Portugal, so far complied with the request, and came as far as Merida, and I made a disposition of my troops in hopes of falling upon him should he have come much nearer. He, however, knew better than Marmont respecting the force on this side, and is again returned to Zafra. Soult, who commands all the troops on the south of the Guadiana, has been employed, as you will see by the papers, in destroying Blake and Freere's people, and he is now near Malaga, collecting troops to attack Ballesteros, who has landed at Algeiras.

Thomas has been moving a good deal lately with Lord W.'s army: I dare say you will hear from him. Clement returned last night, and tells me that he did not write to you from Lisbon; but he promised to do so by this day's packet. If I had thought he had not, I should not have so lightly mentioned in my last my best thanks to you for your kind attention respecting the hounds, which have arrived so well, are now within four days' march of this place, and I am sure will afford great amusement to the officers of this part of the army, who, I am persuaded, are entitled to every recreation circumstances will admit of.

Kind remembrances to all at Hawkstone, not forgetting

Rowland and John.* Pray tell the former I will endeavour to procure him a beautiful Spanish horse: they are in general much handsomer than the Portuguese.

“Yours ever most affectionately,

“R. HILL.”

On the 25th and 27th of September the combats of El Boden and Aldea Ponte took place, when Lord Wellington had much reason to be satisfied with the Portuguese soldiery trained by British officers; and the Prince of Orange also manifested a spirit and intelligence, which confirmed the anticipations of General Hill on meeting His Serene Highness at Lord Wellington's table. In the despatch announcing these affairs His Lordship observed, “General Girard had collected at Merida a small body of troops, I believe with the intention of making an incursion into Portugal, under the notion that I had withdrawn Lieutenant-General Hill's corps from the Alemtejo for the purpose of maintaining the blockade of Ciudad Rodrigo. But I imagine that he will break up this collection again, as he shall hear that General Hill is at Portalegre.” In reference to this General Hill remarked in a letter to Hawkstone, dated September 8., “Lord Wellington's despatches will, I dare say, make you acquainted with the events which have taken place in the north. Marmont has, I believe, fallen back to the cantonments he occupied previous to his relieving Ciudad Rodrigo, and Girard is gone to his former quarters at Zafra. We are, however, a little on the alert again on this side, in consequence of the return of Soult to Seville; and it is supposed he was coming to Estremadura; in consequence of which, I am getting back some of my troops which I lent to Lord W. when he was threatened by Marmont."

* The present Viscount Hill, and his brother the Rev. John Hill.

Towards the middle of October Girard's division crossed the Guadiana at Merida, and inflicted the greatest annoyances on the northern district of Estremadura, in consequence of which, General Hill proposed to operate against him in conjunction with the Spaniards under Castanos. His principal objects were, first, to drive the enemy from Caceres; secondly, to force him to re-cross the Guadiana; and thirdly, to endeavour to cut off the retreat of the whole or part of the hostile forces posted at Caceres, before they could be augmented or supported. As no ulterior advantage could be derived from the first object without the accomplishment of the second, this became the chief consideration in the General's disposition of his troops. Lord Wellington fully approved his design, if it could be undertaken "without risking the safety of Campo Mayor and Orguela," which he was assured might be done, at both these places were considered invulnerable from assault; but the General was instructed not to pass Caceres with his head-quarters and main body; and when he had driven off Girard, he was to replace the Conde de Penne Villemur at Caceres, and bring back his troops, who had endured the greatest sufferings from the weather, towards the frontier. The French retired from Caceres on the 26th; but their pursuers had no certain tidings as to the direction they had taken, and therefore the suffering British and Portuguese soldiers were halted by their considerate leader for that night ■ Malpartida, while he himself used efforts to discover the route of the retreating enemy. His information rendered it certain that they ■ gone to Torremocha, and ■ endeavoured, by taking ■ shorter road than theirs, to intercept and bring them to action. While ■ his march, General Hill discovered that Girard ■ ■ Arroyo de Molinos, and not ■ of his movements, which at ■ induced him to decide ■ overtaking and surprising the whole force of the French, ■ at all events compelling them to an action. The weather was wretched in the extreme ; but the soldiers did not fail in ■ long forced march instantly undertaken in the most perfect quietude, that no symptom of their approach might alarm the enemy. By the evening of the 27th they were at Alcuéscar, within four miles of their unconscious foes. Every conceivable precaution ■ resorted to. The light companies ■ thrown into the villages to prevent the natives from alarming the enemy ; and the cavalry, artillery, and infantry ■ disposed of in the neighbouring fields, with the strictest orders not to cheer the cold and gloomy night with ■ single fire, the flickering of which might give indication that they ■ ■ The wind blew furiously ; the rain fell in torrents ; and the patient soldiery had no protection from the storm, except the drenched coverings of their tents, which the gale had thrown down ; but their patience and confidence in the leader they loved deserted them not. They ■ warmed by the flush of expectation that the morning would recompense them for ■ their toils ; and the first streaks of dawn had not appeared [REDACTED] the horizon, when the various columns [REDACTED] in, without [REDACTED] single note of [REDACTED] bugle [REDACTED] the beat even of one solitary drum. The ground [REDACTED] admirably chosen with a view to concealment: they filed quietly through the village, and having crossed an intervening mountain, found themselves, just [REDACTED] the day began to break, within half a mile of Arroyo, where Girard [REDACTED] yet in security, ignorant of their presence and his own danger. At this instant a violent hail-storm, pouring [REDACTED] the rear of the allies, caused the faces of the French picquets to be turned from them; but just [REDACTED] they were ready to make the decisive movement the clouds cleared away, the sky became serene, and the hostile corps was preparing for their march, in expectation of a propitious day. The decisive moment had arrived. General Hill was himself inspired, [REDACTED] was every brave [REDACTED] he commanded, with the enthusiasm of the scene. The usual calmness of his demeanour, rendered [REDACTED] [REDACTED] than commonly striking by the precautions he had taken for silence, became suddenly converted into an animation that cheered and almost amused every witness of his ardour. It seemed kindled in [REDACTED] instant. He drew his sword,—gave [REDACTED] loud hurrah,—spurred his horse,—and led the charge [REDACTED] the astonished ranks of the French, then forming without [REDACTED] thought that he was so [REDACTED] at hand. The first brigade, headed thus vigorously by himself, moved at once [REDACTED] the village of Arroyo, and the Highlanders catching up the humour of the hour, [REDACTED] heard playing [REDACTED] their bagpipes “Heigh, Johnny Cope, [REDACTED] you waking yet?”

The second brigade, under General Howard, moved quietly round to the other side of the place, to intercept the troops which the first should drive out. In the centre came the cavalry, ready to act in whatever way might be deemed expedient. Presently the 71st and 92nd Regiments dashed into Arroyo, and upon the French just as they were filing out, with the exception of one brigade, which had marched for some time before daylight. This charge first announced to them the snare into which they had fallen; and with only a feeble effort on the part of their cavalry, they were driven before the bayonets of the British. The French infantry, nevertheless, having emerged from the town, tried to form into two squares with cavalry on their left; but the 71st lining the garden-walls of the town, poured into them a fearful fire, which was soon succeeded by that of artillery. They fled in utter confusion, and the capture of prisoners, cannon and baggage, rapidly followed. Then came the memorable pursuit of that extraordinary day. Just behind the routed forces of Girard rose the rocky and steep Sierra de Montanches, up which they clambered in a state of utter confusion, throwing away their arms, ammunition, and knapsacks, and yielding their persons as prisoners to their pursuers at every step. In the excitement of such a chase the British, the Portuguese, and the Spaniards, seemed all to forget that they had been without rest, and soaked with rain and mist all the night before. They laughed, shouted, jumped in their heavy coutrements, or caught the scrambling horses of the fugitives, who could not ride them up the mountain, and down mounted triumph, fatigue caused some to desist, and the rest being too much scattered, judiciously stopped the summit of the Sierra by General Howard. Nearly fifteen hundred prisoners were taken, and some of them of high rank. Lieutenant Blakeney, of the 28th, leaped a wall, and seized the Prince D'Artemberg in the midst of a group of officers. General Brun also taken, with a colonel of cavalry, aide-de-camp of Girard, two lieutenant-colonels, commissaire de guerre, and less than thirty captains and inferior officers. Girard himself, with a handful of men, escaped by the bridge of Medellin, declaring he would rather die than surrender. It was altogether most brilliant achievement, and is thus eloquently adverted to by Major Sherer in his Recollections of the day. "One thing in our success at Arroyo de Molinos gratified our division highly; it was a triumph for our General — a triumph all his own. He gained great credit for this well-conducted enterprise; and he gained what, to me of his mild, kind, and humane character, was still more valuable, a solid and bloodless victory; for it is certainly the truest maxim in war, 'that conquest is twice achieved, where the achiever brings home few numbers.'" Indeed the loss in his division was most trifling, while a deep blow was inflicted on the enemy. Girard was wounded before he escaped, and Soult afterwards arrested him, and reported him to Bonaparte, who, knowing that he was, notwithstanding this misadventure, a thoroughly brave soldier, pardoned him in the expectation of future services. In his official reports to Lord Wellington, General Hill did the utmost justice to the officers under his command, and rejoiced in the opportunity of bringing into notice his aid-de-camp, Captain Currie, who was rewarded by subsequent promotion. Lord Wellington received the commendation of this distinguished service with unequivocal tokens of satisfaction; and in a letter to Lord Liverpool thus expressed his sense of the merit of him to whom the reward was due—"It would be particularly agreeable to me if it were a mark of the favour of His Royal Highness the Prince Regent conferred upon General Hill; his services have been always meritorious, and very distinguished in this country, and he is beloved by the whole army." He adverted to his various gallant acts, from the passage of the Douro to the last operation at Arroyo, and continued, "In recommending him, I do most anxiously, I really feel that there is no officer to whom an act of grace and favour would be received by the army with more satisfaction than General Hill." Lord Wellington justly described the sentiments of the army towards the subject of these deserved commendations, whose name was never mentioned by those who served under him without some affectionate expression. General Hill gave a brief account of the action in a letter to his sister.

"My dear Sister,

"Portalegre, Nov. 5. 1811.

"I am, my dear friends, very glad that Mr Hawkstone will rejoice to hear of my good fortune, and share with me the satisfaction I feel, in having, under the will of Divine Providence, given a severe blow to the common enemy, and, thank God, almost without loss on our side. My official report on the business, which I dare say Clement will carry to England in the same ship which will take this, will give you a detailed account of what has happened; but in case it should not, I have time merely to inform you that on the morning of the 28th, ■ day-break, I succeeded in surprising, attacking, and annihilating the French corps under General Girard ■ Arroyo ■ Molinoa. The enemy's force when attacked consisted of about 3000 infantry, 1600 cavalry and artillery. The result is the capture of one General, Brun, one Colonel, the Prince D'Arenberg, thirty-five Lieutenant Colonels ■ inferior officers, 1400 prisoners, and probably 500 killed. The others dispersed, having thrown away their arms: we have also got all the enemy's artillery, baggage, and magazines—in short, everything that belonged to the corps.

"Clement, I am pretty certain, will go in the ship that carries this, otherwise I would send you ■ more detailed account, although I should lose ■ dinner, which is ■ going on the table. The Prince and most of the French officers dine with me. The British here have been very kind to the French since they have been in our possession, and they seem very grateful for it.

"Clement behaved very gallantly, as indeed did all.

"Yours ■ affectionately,

"R. H.

"Clement is now gone to Lord W. with my report."

The congratulations received by General Hill from his brother officers ■ ■ and flattering. General Murray wrote, "I feel ■ peculiar pleasure in this fortunate affair, as it ■ yourself personally, and ■ you that I only repeat the sentiments which are in the mouth of every one whom I have heard speak upon the subject." Marshal Beresford ■ marked, "I confess I did not think Girard would have allowed himself to be overtaken; but you completely out-manceuvred him, and the thing ■ complete." Lord Wellington, ■■■ the arrival of Captain Clement Hill ■■ head-quarters, addressed ■■ brief but gratifying letter to the General.

■ My dear Hill,

■ Frenda, Nov. 9. 1811.

"I have not written to you since the 22d; as I have had nothing new to interest you, and I would not interrupt your operations. Nothing could be more satisfactory to ■■ than all you did; and I am happy that I had determined to send home your brother with the report of your transactions, before ■■ had heard that it was your wish that I should do so.

"He and Churchill will tell you how we are going on here.

■ Ever yours most sincerely,

■ WELLINGTON.

"Lieut.-General Hill."

His old friend, General Graham's note ■■■ kind and characteristic.

■ My dear Hill,

■ Lagios, Nov. 12. 1811.

"I rejoiced most truly on hearing of your success, but I delayed writing to congratulate you on it, till I should see your despatch with the particulars. Lord Wellington sent me your letters two days ago, at the same time expressing his high approbation of your conduct, a testimony more valuable than any other, but one which in every body's opinion is most justly deserved by the judgment, activity, and admirable arrangements which produced so brilliant a result with so trifling a loss. Currie has been good enough to send me a sketch of the ground and disposition of the troops, which I prize much, and which perfectly explains the movements described in your report. I beg you will make him my best thanks, and pray remember me too to Squire, who, I am happy to see, is such a favourite with you. I hope your health has not suffered by the fatigue and bad weather. Adieu.—I hear you have got hounds, and have you a tolerable country and good sport? At head-quarters I am told they have already done up all their horses. Here we have only a little coursing and shooting, neither in much perfection. Once more adieu, and believe me ever most faithfully yours,

“ THOS. GRAHAM.

“ Pray remember me to Sir W. Erskine.”

Captain Clement Hill, who carried the news of his brother's [REDACTED] to England, had a very bad passage of eighteen days' duration, [REDACTED] that [REDACTED] arriving he found the tidings had preceded him; but happily the accounts, instead of having been exaggerated, fell short of the reality. Captain [REDACTED] described his own reception in a letter dated, “ Mr. Codd's Office, Horse Guards, 2d December.” He says, “ I got here yesterday with the despatch. Lord Liverpool [REDACTED] at his country house at Coomb, where I went to him. He read the [REDACTED] tents of it, and then sent [REDACTED] on with it to Oatlands for the Prince to see. [REDACTED] Royal Highness is still confined to his bed, and I did not see him. I saw the Duke of York and a great many other of the great people there, and every one spoke in the highest terms of the business. I returned to Lord Liverpool's at night, and dined there: he was uncommonly kind, and, like every body else, pleased. In short, I am [REDACTED] nothing that has been done during the [REDACTED] has given so much satisfaction.”

General Hill's proceedings [REDACTED] worthy of all the admiration they excited. [REDACTED] gave the artillery he had taken to the Spaniards, for which he received a glowing letter of thanks from Castanos; and he treated his prisoners not only with the courtesy of a gentleman, but with the kindness of genuine heroism. Lord Wellington attached much importance to the capture of the Prince d'AreMBERG, from his connection with the Imperial Family, and enjoined strict vigilance ■■■■ him; yet General Hill executed this delicate duty so as to elicit from his illustrious charge the warmest expressions of gratitude. We have seen how his friends wrote to him: the letter of his prisoner just before he was sent to England equally deserves attention:—

■ ■■ Général,

“ Lisbonne, le 3 Xbre, 1811.

■ Au moment de m'embarquer pour l'Angleterre, je regarde ■■■■ ■■ devoir de vous renouveler mes remerciemens pour toutes les bontés dont ■■■■ m'avez comblé pendant le tems que j'ai été ■■■■ ■■■■. Croyez, ■■■■ Général, que je serais heureux, si l'occasion se présentait, d'être utile à quelques officiers de votre division; ■■■■ pourront partout ■■■■ réclamer avec confiance.

■ J'ose de ■■■■ prier de faire passer les lettres ci-jointes ■■ Badajos; c'est une affaire d'intérêt que je désire terminer ■■■■ ■■■■ chef d'escadron.

■ Veuillez agréer l'assurance du profond respect ■■■■ lequel j'ai l'honneur d'être, mon Général, votre très humble et très obéissant serviteur.

“ LE DUC D'AREMBERG.”

Much reason, indeed, had the writer and his fellow-prisoners to thank General Hill, who not only showed them every civility while with him, but provided for their kind reception in England, ■■■■ appears from ■■■■ sentence in ■■■■ letter of Lord Mulgrave. His Lordship said — “ If your prisoners should come to London, I will show them every attention in my power, and will take ■■■■ that they ■■■■ know they ■■■■ it to your favourable report and recommendation of them.”

Lord Mulgrave added to this, "You have nothing to wish beyond the impression you have made on the public mind." A second letter was also addressed to him from the same quarter:—

"Dear Hill,

"Harley Street, Dec. ■ 1811.

"I had written and sealed my last letter immediately on the receipt of yours, and before it was in my power to congratulate you, as I do most cordially, on the professional distinction which awaits you, as soon as it can be bestowed on you. It will be satisfactory to you to know that in the letters which I have received from the part of the army which is immediately under the command of Lord Wellington, your brother officers all do justice to the mode in which the service was conducted and success prepared, and appear to rejoice at your victory almost as much on personal as on public feelings.

"Believe me with the greatest regard,

"Ever yours ■■■■ faithfully,

"MULGRAVE."

The honour referred to in this letter ■■■■ thus announced to General Hill by Lord Liverpool:—

"(Private.)

"Sir,

"Downing Street, December 4, 1811.

"I have had particular satisfaction in transmitting to Lord Wellington, by the mail of this day, the Prince Regent's most cordial and decided approbation of your conduct in the late operations against the French force under General Girard. His Royal Highness does the fullest justice to the distinguished ability with which you have conducted this important service, and I can assure you, that his Majesty's confidential servants, and the public in general, most entirely participate in ■■■■ Prince Regent's feelings upon this occasion.

I have great pleasure in being enabled further to add that ■■■■ Prince Regent has authorised me to assure you that as soon as the restrictions upon the regency have expired, it is his intention to confer upon you the Order of the Bath, as a proof of the sense which his Royal Highness entertains of your services.

"As it may be a satisfaction to you to be in possession of the original document, containing his Royal Highness's assurances upon this point, I have the honour to send it to you, together with an extract of my note, to which it

"I am, with great truth, Sir,

"Your very faithful and obedient humble servant,

"LIVERPOOL."

The approbation of his Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief, was conveyed to him by Colonel Torrens, the Military Secretary:—

"Private.

"My dear General,

"Guards, Dec. 8. 1811.

"I beg your acceptance of my most sincere congratulations upon the brilliant success, which has attended your expedition against the French force under General Girard. After the flattering testimony which has been borne of the public approbation, I shall not render myself liable to the imputation of flattery, by the expression of my individual opinion that the previous arrangements of the surprise of the enemy, and the promptitude of execution, reflect upon you a degree of credit as a General which few indeed have had the good fortune to attain. The whole country are united in one voice of approval; and I heartily rejoice that such a distinguished reward has attended your unremitting and laborious services. The public approbation, though inconstant and whimsical, has charms in it, which, as a soldier, I appreciate much beyond any favour unsupported by general and well-earned applause; and therefore I take double pleasure in the justice which is universally done to your distinguished conduct.

"Captains Currie and Squire will be promoted, on your recommendation, to the rank of Major, and your brother also, upon the expiration of his period of service, will be advanced to the same rank. I assure you his Royal Highness had great pleasure in giving effect to your wishes respecting Captain Currie; and he will also be ready to show every possible attention ■ the other ■■■■ whom you have recommended to notice, when he has the means of facilitating ■■■■ advancement.

“ I imagine that this camp on your part will close the scene of any active operations, until the opening of the spring.

“ I beg you ■■■■ command my services here in any ■■■■ in which you think I ■■■■ contribute ■ the accomplishment of your wishes; and when you have time to write a ■■■■ upon what ■ going on, I shall be most grateful to you to think of ■■■■

“ His Royal Highness's official letter to Lord Wellington, will sufficiently show the extent of his approbation to render any further ■■■■ on my part quite unnecessary, to ■■■■ vince you of the high sense his Royal Highness entertains of your distinguished conduct.

“ Believe me, my dear General, to be “ Ever yours ■■■■ faithfully and sincerely,

“ II. TORRENA.”

In reflecting upon this exploit ■ many excellences present themselves to the mind, that it ■■■■ disposed to rest ■ each till another is exhibited to its view. First we see ■ quick conception of an advantage, followed by ■ effort in the face of fatigue and the elements, that placed his enemy in his hands without ■ sound of his approach; then the silence of the ■■■■ approach itself ■■■■ succeeded by ■ burst of heroic animation that cheered on his wearied followers to new energy; the achievement completed, his generous spirit applied every possible alleviation to the ■■■■ dition of his captives; and ■ last, when his honours were accorded ■ him by ■ grateful country, the meek- ■■■■ of ■■■■ bearing enhanced the estimation of his merits, ■■■ the interest with which he ■■■ regarded by all men, citizen and soldier, friend and foe.

Not many weeks elapsed after this blow to the hostile army, ere tidings of ■■■ movements on the part of the French reached General Hill in his cantonments, and he ■■■ directed by Lord Wellington to ■■■ also. The object will be found described in a letter written to his brother, then in England:—

“ My dear Clement.

“ Portalegre, Dec. ■■■ 1811.

“ We ■■■ again in motion, not on account of the enemy being ■■■ us, but because he is pressing Ballesterow and the town of Tarifa; and it is hoped that my movement upon Merida and Almandralejo may make a diversion in favour of our friends in the South. I shall be at Albuquerque to-morrow, and move directly upon Merida.

“ A courier arrived here yesterday, bringing me a letter from Lord Liverpool, and a correspondence between him and the Prince, full of flattering expressions. The purport of the correspondence is ‘the Prince’s most cordial and decided approbation of my conduct;’ and he ■■■ me, that ■■■ us the restrictions upon the Regency have expired, it is his intention to confer upon ■■■ the Order of the Bath.*

You cannot possibly be in time for this march, therefore you need not hurry.

“ Yours very faithfully,

“ R. HILL.”

On the 27th of December General Hill passed into Estremadura, and discovering ■■■ lack of vigilance

* A similar intimation had been ■■■ by ■■■ Wellington, who, ■■■ communicating ■■■ General Hill, observed, “ It may fall to my ■■■ be ■■■ instrument of conveying to you ■■■ honour intended for you, as I have acted in a similar capacity in respect to others; but I assure you that I shall perform this duty, if ■■■ devolve upon ■■■, with at least as much satisfaction as I have on ■■■ occasion.”

the part of the French, he meditated giving them another surprise, and had almost hoped to have gained march Dombrowski as he did on Girard. A patrole, however, from a detachment discovered an advanced guard of the 29th; and though he used every effort to prevent this small body from retiring from Merida, the retreat effected by the skill and gallantry of Captain Neveux, who knew the nature of the country, and how to take the fullest advantage of it. Our cavalry could only inflict upon him the loss of about forty men. But General Dombrowski, not relishing the idea of the approach of General Hill, retired from Merida in the night, leaving a magazine of bread, and 160,000 lbs. of wheat, besides several unfinished works. On the 1st of January, 1812, General Hill marched on to Almandralejo, in hopes of coming up with Count D'Erlon, but the Count got off as soon as he was apprized of his danger. A portion of the allies under Colonel Abercromby — a worthy son of the hero of Egypt — nevertheless had a small affair of great brilliancy with a strong party of the French cavalry at Fuente del Maestre. The subjoined letter gives an account of all these proceedings: —

“ My dear Sister,

“ Merida, Jan. 6. 1812.

“ The mail arrived here last night, bringing your letter of the 12th, for which I beg you will accept my best thanks. I wrote Clement on Christmas-Day to tell you that I was the point of making an attempt to draw the enemy's attention from Ballesteros, who was hard pressed at Gibraltar. On the 1st I entered the town, from whence the enemy retired on our approach, leaving some stores of corn, I having obtained a great advantage over them the preceding day.

"On the 1st I marched to Almandralejo, ■ hopes that Count D'Erlon would have given me an opportunity of coming in contact with him. He, however, retreated, and ■ yesterday in full march towards and near Llerena. The dreadful state of the weather and the condition of the roads, render any further operations on my part impossible without incurring great risks, and exceeding my instructions. I returned here two days ago, and my stay will depend chiefly on my supplies.

"■ conclude, ■ it is post-time. Kind remembrance to ■

"Yours very affectionately,

"R. II.

"My movement has occasioned great alarm to the enemy, and I trust I have effected the object in view. Clement will be glad to hear that Abercromby has had an opportunity of doing something. The affair of Fuente del Maestro does him and ■ engaged great credit."

On the 19th of January Lord Wellington terminated the celebrated siege of Ciudad Rodrigo, in which Colonel Thomas Noel Hill behaved most gallantly. The General ■ too happy to apprise his family of his brother's distinction.

"My dear Sister,

"Niza, Jan. 23. 1812.

"Before you receive this you will have heard of the taking of Ciudad Rodrigo. Things seem to have been very well managed there by all concerned in the capture; and I am happy ■ find that Tom and his regiment had an opportunity of distinguishing themselves.

"Lord W. having conceived that my late movement to ■ southward of the Guadiana, had created every diversion in favour of Ballesteros and Tarifa which could have been expected from it, he directed me to return to Portugal, and ■ up a position with my right ■ Portalegre, ■ here, and left at Castello Branco. The object of taking up ■ position was the probability of the enemy making an attempt on this side to draw Lord W.'s attention from Ciudad Rodrigo.

"Clement [redacted] yet arrived: by his last letter we may, I think, expect him daily. Lord W. sent me his despatch to Lord Liverpool to read, and by it I am glad to find that honourable mention is made in it of Colonel Campbell and [redacted] 94th, for their conduct [redacted] the storming of [redacted] Rodrigo. Kind remembrances [redacted] all, and believe [redacted] be,

"Yours very affectionately,

"R. H."

(On the 28th of January Lord Wellington addressed a letter to General Hill from Gallegos, the original of which is marked secret and confidential; but [redacted] it appears in Gurwood's eighth volume, [redacted] quotation from it is all that is requisite. After informing him that the enemy had not advanced from the Tormes, that the re-establishment of Ciudad Rodrigo was proceeding, and that it was proposed to replace the army in their old cantonments, his Lordship acquainted him that he [redacted] "turning his mind seriously to Badajoz." He then proceeded, — "When we shall attack Badajoz [redacted] must expect that the army of Portugal, [redacted] consisting of eight divisions of infantry, the whole of which [redacted] in Castille, and the army of the South, will co-operate to oblige us to raise the siege. The army of Portugal would naturally [redacted] the Tagus by their bridge at Almaraz; and they would be obliged, [redacted] the [redacted] of the year in which I propose to undertake this operation, to go round [redacted] by Toledo, [redacted] could destroy their bridge and other establishments [redacted] that place. This [redacted] what I wish you to attempt."

The General's reply [redacted] communication shows how thoroughly he entered into all the plans of Lord

Wellington, what grounds were for the confidence reposed in him: —

“ My dear Lord,

“ Nisa, Jan. 30. 1808

“ I have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your Lordship's letter of the 28th, marked secret and confidential, and will use my best endeavours to comply with the instructions which it contains. Your Lordship will perceive, by Mr. Hillier's report on Almaraz, dated the 16th instant, that I have been inattentive to your wishes on the subject of the destruction of the enemy's works at that place. You will likewise observe, that on the 16th the enemy had only two boats on the river, and the others, nine in number, on the north bank of the river, mounted in carriages, and two spare carriages.

I have, &c.

“ Viscount Wellington, K. B.,
&c. &c. &c.”

“ R. HILL.

The report of Lieutenant Hillier called in Lord Wellington's a “ very clear ” one; and he proposed to supply General Hill with the means of sending a detachment to the right of the Tagus, to cut off the retreat of these boats, which was the principal object of his expedition.

At this time General Hill had the satisfaction of seeing in the English papers the complimentary allusion to his exploit at Arroyo de Molinos, in the speech of His Royal Highness the Prince Regent at the opening of Parliament. It was thus deservedly commended: — “ The successful and brilliant enterprise, which terminated in the surprise, in Spanish Estremadura, of a French corps by a detachment of the British army under Lieutenant-General Hill, highly creditable to that distinguished officer, and the troops under his command, and which contributed materially to obstruct the designs of the enemy in that part of the Peninsula." In writing home on the 1st of January, he alluded to this honourable mention of his name with evident gratification, and also to a letter he had received from Mr. Henry Wellesley, then at Cadiz, relative to his diversion in favour of Ballesteros and Tarifa. Mr. Wellesley, in allusion to the loss of the French at Tarifa, assured him that it was "certainly not less than 2000 men, leaving behind them all their artillery, ammunition, &c." Then he proceeded, — "It is probable that your movement in Extremadura contributed greatly to this event." In quoting this passage, General Hill himself observed, "I confess I think it is most likely that it did, for on the 1st, 2d, and 3d we advanced rapidly, the alarm of which must have reached Tarifa on the 5th, the day the enemy retired suddenly from before the place."

By the 10th of February General Hill had formed an opinion that the expedition against the enemy's boats on the Tagus near Almaraz, was not practicable; and Lord Wellington entirely concurred in the opinion he assigned. He was, however, fully prepared to make any attempt deemed advisable, "at the shortest notice." Eight days after this he wrote from Portalegre, — "The greater part of Lord Wellington's army is marching to this side of the Tagus; I therefore think we shall try what can be done with Badajoz." By the 1st of March he was enabled to say, "Things are becoming a little interesting again in this quarter. Lord W. is on the point of undertaking the siege of Badajoz, for which purpose the whole of the army is on its march to this side of the Tagus, and the enemy have ■ ■ present shown any disposition to oppose him."

Shortly after this announcement of ■ ■ of things around him, he received from Lord Wellington the insignia of the Order of the Bath, accompanied by an invitation to Elvas for investment.

" My dear Hill,

" Portalegre, ■ 10. 1812.

" I ■ herewith the letter from the Secretary of State, and the insignia of the Order of the Bath, and the copy of a letter to me, directing ■ to invest you therewith.

" I am going to Elvas to-morrow; and ■ I believe ■ earliest occasion will be on every account the most suitable, I would invest you there on the next day, the 12th, if you ■ make it convenient to come over.

" Pray invite the General and Staff of the ■ Division to ■ over ■ Elvas to be present on the occasion, and to dine with me; and likewise General Hamilton and General Long, if they should be near you.

" I'll take care that you shall ■ be quartered in Elvas.

" Ever yours most sincerely,

" WELLINGTON.

" I understand that you wish to know by what road I shall ■ to-morrow. — By the direct road by Assunar.

" Bring the insignia of the Order with you ■ the 12th."

The day after the ceremonial he let his family know that it had taken place:—

" My dear Sister,

" Elvas, ■ 13. 1812.

" Lord Wellington arrived here the day before yesterday, and desired General Graham and myself to come over for the purpose of being invested with the Order of the Bath, which ceremony took place yesterday.

" Nearly the whole of the army is on ■ side the Tagus. Our operations against Badajoz will ■ immediately. It is not intended that my troops should have any thing to do with the duties of the siege, but will form a covering army on the north of the Guadiana, in the direction of Merida, whilst General Graham, with a similar corps, will be on the north of that river. . . . .

■ Adieu, my dear sister.

“ Yours ever affectionately,

“ R. HILL.”

Those who knew Sir Rowland Hill, by which title he must now be called, will not wonder ■ the brief dismissal of the subject of his ■ honour in ■ letter. Never did the insignia he so nobly ■ upon ■ breast that ■ them more meekly. “ When he was knighted,” says an esteemed officer ■ his personal staff, “ there was not one of ■ dared for nearly six months to call him Sir Rowland: he was quite distressed at being called any thing but General; and it ■ only very gradually that he could be driven to bear his honour.” A letter to his brother ■ the subject of supporters to his arms, at ■ manifests his simplicity of mind, and the way in which he could, under circumstances of the most exciting nature, coolly divest himself of their influence ■ attend to the minutest affairs claiming his notice.

“ Guercua, four leagues in front ■ Merida,

“ My dear Brother,

■■■ 31. 1812.

“ I have received your letter, enclosing ■ from General Wynyard, recommending Mr. Nayler. That gentleman ■ been recommended to me by several of my friends. I have in consequence appointed him to transact the requisite ■ for me in the College of Arms. Mr. Nayler, in his letter to me, says, on being favoured with my wishes on the subject of supporters, proper sketches shall be sent to me. Now, my dear brother, I do not wish you to go to town on purpose, but when you do go I shall be obliged if you will see Mr.

Naylor; and knowing you to be a man of taste, I wish you would give him some hints on the occasion. Perhaps by consulting our friends ■ Hawkstone ■ my acquisitions might be arranged to the best advantage: for ■ part, I do not care much what the supporters are, but, ■ confess, I ■ much ■ fancy figures, such as I have ■ to ■ supported by a jolly tar, a grenadier, a light infantry man, or ■ heavy or light dragoon; such, I think, are bad. It strikes ■ that animals are the handsomest. Some have lions: you and I, probably, would have no objection to ■ greyhound, while there ■ others who would prefer the fox-hound: but upon ■ whole I should be glad to leave the choice ■ the ladies; they have ■ than we have.*

“ You will get later accounts from Badajoz than ■ contain, ■ it will pass by that place, which every day ■ are extremely interesting; and before this quits the Tagus the fate of that garrison will probably be decided. Every thing ■ going on well there. Soult is certainly in full march, in hopes of relieving it; but as Marmont is still at ■ great distance, I do not think Soult will, by himself, venture to attack us. His advance is pretty near me now. Two of his cavalry regiments arrived at San Benito, four leagues from hence; but ■ are ready for ■ start in the first instance, and ■ fight, should ■ persist.

“ Yours ■ most affectionately,
 “ H. H.”

In consequence of the movements of the French forces, Sir Thomas Graham ■ ordered to ■ back upon Villa Franca, and Sir Rowland Hill upon Merida, the bridge of which place he ■ desired ■ destroy ■ leaving it. In writing to Lord Wellington, ■ Rowland remarked, “ The preparations for breaking up the bridge appear to have created a sensation in the town:" to which Lordship replied, with that consideration which he always manifested, "Tell the Alcalde or Corregidor that if we destroy the bridge I will render it passable again for them; that it is to answer a military purpose, and be done if necessary." This promise was faithfully fulfilled a few weeks afterwards.

* The part here omitted refers to the Castle, which had also been given merely to details of business relating to Sir ■ services. ■ governorship ■

Sir Thomas Graham, who fell back towards Albuera, was in almost daily communication with Sir Rowland Hill at this time, but their letters referred chiefly to the various reports of the enemy's approach; and though, perhaps, of great interest to persons qualified and inclined to trace the fine manœuvres of these generals, they are by no means suited to this memoir. The siege of Badajoz went on; Drouet and Darican only advanced to hear that the place had fallen. Such was the slaughter, that Wellington himself shed tears over his own conquest, when he thought on the valiant dead that fell in that scene of carnage. The town was bravely defended, but a British army under Wellington bore with it irresistible power. Sir Rowland Hill shall again give his own impression, and describe his situation.

"My dear Sister,

"Almendralejo, April 15. 1812.

"Clement and Thomas, I know, wrote you by my last packet, giving you an account of the fall of Badajoz, which is certainly a glorious and important event, though at a dear-bought victory, as will appear by the long list of killed and wounded which will accompany the official

"Marmont's movements in the North have made it easy for Lord Wellington to recross the Tagus; and my corps is again advanced to this part of the country for the purpose of covering Badajoz while the works of that place are repairing.

"Soul, ■ present, is moving towards Seville; and I do not think he will be inclined to have any thing to do with us here.

• • • • •

"Yours very affectionately,

"R. HILL."

We will now pass ■ to the next achievement of Sir Rowland Hill—the surprise of Almaraz. He was directed by Lord Wellington to undertake this enterprise, in order to destroy the only means possessed by the French of effecting a passage of the Tagus. This ■ a boat-bridge laid down by Marmont and secured by strong defences. His Lordship thus instructed him on the 24th of April:—"Marmont has retired, and I shall immediately get provisions into Ciudad Rodrigo. I propose, while this operation is going on, to send some troops back across the Tagus, and to distribute the whole in such ■ ■ ■ as that they ■ be easily subsisted. I think that you might avail yourself of this opportunity to strike your blow at Almaraz. I think that ■ of your British brigades and two Portuguese brigades, ■ one-and-a-half British and ■ strong Portuguese brigade, would do your business ■ to the French in that neighbourhood. * ■ ■ ■ Make all your preparations in secret for this expedition. I shall watch from hence the ■ of the enemy's retreat, and will let you know if it should appear to me that you have any thing to fear from any of the divisions of the army of Portugal going near Almaraz. Of course you will not march till you shall hear farther from me." On the 30th he was directed to be prepared, and by the end of the first week in May would have marched on, but his progress was impeded by the delay arising from the timber supplied being too small for the repair of the bridge at Merida. The work itself was commenced in ample time, and Sir Rowland reported to Lord Wellington that Major Squire and another engineer had been there to make every arrangement. "They remained three days, and returned, saying that all the materials were to be ready on the following Monday. Every assistance required by the engineers was given, and 400 men sent to Merida." They had to send for more timber to Badajos, so that a considerable delay arose, giving much uneasiness to all parties; and Sir Rowland wrote as follows to Lord Wellington:—

"Almadrakjo, May 1812, 6 P.M.

"My dear Lord,

"Last night I received your letter of the 7th. Your Lordship will have been informed before this of the delay, in consequence of the bridge at Merida not being repaired. If, however, we take into consideration the advantage of having given Dickson's train a day's halt, not more than twenty-four hours will have been lost. That, however, may be of consequence, but I trust it will not; and your Lordship may depend on celerity and exertion when we do start. The engineers reported to me three days ago, that the bridge would be ready on the evening of the 12th. I hope, however, in hopes it will be passable to-morrow evening, or early on the 13th. In either of the latter cases, I will march to-morrow, so as to be able to make a march on the other side of Merida by the 13th. At present I am sure some one here has the least idea of our [redacted] It is generally supposed that Dickson is coming to this side of the Guadiana with the intention of our attacking Bella Casa. I have the honour to enclose some papers just received. Penne Villemur's account of Soult is rather contradictory.

“ I have, &c.

“ R. HILL.

“ General the Earl of Wellington, K.B.,
&c. &c. &c.”

On receiving this intelligence Lord Wellington remarked to Sir Thomas Graham, “ I [redacted] very much afraid Hill will be late.” But on the 13th he heard that Marmont's troops had not yet moved into Estremadura, and observed, “ If this is the case, Hill will be yet in time.” He [redacted] in time for his chieftain's project and his own fame. Ere sunset on the 12th all the troops destined for this service had filed over the bridge and assembled in the town. By the 15th he reached Truxillo, and caused skilful feints to be made for deceiving the enemy. Foy [redacted] completely taken in, and by the morning of the 16th Sir Rowland was at Jaraicejo. From this place to Almaraz there [redacted] two leagues of majestic scenery. The descent from a high ridge to the Tagus has on its right broken [redacted] of wild mountains, and deep beneath their rugged bases lie vales of a fertility and [redacted] verdure, mingled with romantic glens, such [redacted] Spain alone can exhibit, and which might make her the envy of the world. At Jaraicejo the troops [redacted] formed into three columns, and a night march was undertaken with [redacted] view to attack [redacted] the same instant the bridge of Almaraz, with its forts, the tower of Mirabete, and a fortified house in the pass. Never was a better arranged; but the column destined to descend from the Sierra, by the pass of Cueva, on Almaraz, had not come down half way from the rugged mountain when daylight unveiled its approach; and the other two found both the Castle of Mirabete and the pass of Mirabete so defended by the enemy that, under the circumstances of the moment, it would have been madness to attack. The only course was to bivouack on the mountain; and the 17th and 18th were spent in reconnoitring: but there seemed not a ray of hope of forcing the pass, or of discovering a single spot on the wild ridge where artillery could either proceed or be let down. Many would have given up the attempt in despair, but the genius of our hero shone forth conspicuously in the gloom of disappointment. At nine o'clock in the evening of the 19th he led a brigade down the mountain by a goat's path, and by the morning's dawn had halted it in concealment on the left bank of the river, about 800 yards from a fort called Napoléon. By eight the enemy came up and the troops were formed; but the hills hid them from the French, who had no conception that they were at hand. First there was a feint made upon Mirabete; and the enemy's soldiers crowded on the parapet of their work to look at this attack. Then rushed the assailants in earnest upon Fort Napoléon, which covered the bridge of Almaraz. Its defenders dreamed of an attack till the sight of the ladders, stained with the blood of Badajoz, and the opening of the fire, roused them into a sense of their danger, and to instant ~~to~~ to ~~it~~ it. ~~they~~ they ~~all~~ all in vain: the parapet was soon mounted by the ~~British~~ British soldiery; resistance in the interior ~~was~~ quickly suppressed; the defenders gave way, and leaving the tower and entrenchment, ~~to~~ to the ~~de pont~~ de pont. Their entrance into this work, and that of their pursuers, ~~was~~ simultaneous. The confusion was tremendous: and ~~all~~ all hope of escape being destroyed by the removal of the boats by the first of those who fled, numbers ~~fell~~ into the river and ~~were~~ drowned, while about 250 were taken prisoners. The guns of Fort Napoléon were soon pointed by the victors against Fort Ragusa, on the other side of the river, and quickly ejected its commandant. Attention ~~was~~ now turned to the passage of the river, and some of them leaped in, swam over, and brought back the boats. Two grenadiers, James Gould and Walter Somerville, led the way; and their gratified General presented them each with a handsome sum of gold, when they returned with the boats from their perilous adventure. The river was immediately passed. Then followed a rapid destruction of the towers, the stores, the ammunition, and at last of the boats; and ~~at~~ night the successful troops reascended the Sierra, bearing the enemy's colours in triumph, and with them ~~more~~ than 250 prisoners, including ~~the~~ commandant and sixteen inferior officers. The entire loss of the British amounted to fifteen officers and 162 privates, killed ~~and~~ wounded. One officer perished by the explosion of his ~~own~~ mine, designed for the destruction of the tower; and the brave Captain Chandler, ~~as~~ he was leading his ~~men~~ up the ladders, had his head severed from his body by a shot.

This rapid and masterly enterprise the works of Mirabete entirely from the right of Tagus, and preparation made by Sir Rowland to reduce them with his heavy artillery; but in consequence of a report from Sir William Erskine, that Soult was in Estremadura with his whole army, he obeyed his instructions and retired to Merida, which place he reached on the 26th. It was unfounded alarm, and Mirabete was left unattempted. Major Currie sent to Lord Wellington with the news, and the colour taken from the enemy. He went afterwards to England with the official despatches, and a recommendation to the Government for his own well-merited promotion.

General Hill's despatch is already published in the ninth volume of Colonel Gurwood's work. One sentence, however, is too characteristic of the writer to be omitted here. Alluding to the diversion against Mirabete by General Chowne, he observed, "I regret much that the peculiar situation of Mirabete, should have prevented my allowing the gallant corps under his orders to follow up an operation which they had commenced with much spirit, and so anxious to complete; but the possession of these forts would have made amends for the valuable blood which must have been shed in taking them." This the spirit of Hill: the comforts of his men and their lives were as dear to him as his own. Lord Wellington, with peculiar keenness, marked parts of this despatch not be published, feeling convinced that the French themselves would evacuate Mirabete, unless they imagined that the British entertained a formidable opinion of its strength. As soon as Sir Rowland arrived at Merida he wrote to Lord Wellington :—

" My dear Lord,

" Merida, May 1812.

" I arrived here about an hour ago, and had the pleasure to receive your Lordship's letter of the 23d, for which I beg you to accept my best thanks. Sir W. Erskine's information, which I received when I was on the bridge at Almaraz, certainly made me a little anxious to get out of the difficult country I was in at that moment. I did not, however, depart from thence until the morning of the 20th, consequently had nearly twenty-four hours to destroy the place. I verily believe that the destruction of every thing was completely effected in every respect, with the exception of the parapets of the redoubts, which were not entirely levelled. The redoubts rendered useless by firing against the other, and afterwards thrown into the deepest part of the river; the masonry towers were entirely levelled, and every piece of timber connected with the works, buildings, and bridge was totally consumed,—indeed, I do not think there is a single thing left that could be of any service to the enemy.

" With respect to Mirabete, I certainly should have been very glad to have got hold of the place, but it appeared impossible to get guns to bear upon it in any reasonable time, and to have attempted to assault it would in all probability have cost me very dear indeed. I at that time had an idea of blockading Mirabete, but ascertaining they had provisions in the place for six weeks I do not think it was right for me to delay my return, particularly as Foy and Drouot both appeared to be in motion.

" I am much obliged to your Lordship for your intention of sending Major Currie to England. I fear you will have considered my report too long. If any apology is necessary on the occasion, it is to be found in the conduct of those whose merit I thought it my duty to bring to your notice, aware that I could offer no greater stimulus to their future

“ I have, &c.,

“ R. HILL.

“ General [redacted] of Wellington, K.B.,
&c. &c. &c.”

No man [redacted] anxious than Sir Rowland [redacted] to do justice to those under his command; and Lord Wellington [redacted] this occasion expressed his [redacted] currence in all he said in their praise, while his [redacted] share [redacted] the exploit called forth new admiration, and opened the way into Spain.

CHAPTER VIII.

MAJOR CURRIE AT HEAD-QUARTERS. — HIS MESSAGE TO SIR ROWLAND HILL — BARRIAGE OF THE RIVER FROM ALNARAZ BY ENEMY'S GUERRILLAS. — LETTERS ON HILL'S BEHALF TO LORDS WELLS AND WELLS — SIR ROWLAND HILL'S ANSWER — LORDS WELLS' ANSWER — SIR ROWLAND HILL'S MARCH TO ALBUKRA. — HIS CAUTION AND JUDGMENT. — LETTERS TO LORDS WELLS AND WELLS — LORDS WELLS' WISHES ANTICIPATED. — LAVIA. — PRUDENT CONSIDERATIONS. — LORDS WELLS ENTER LAVIA. — LORDS WELLS' MOVEMENTS OF THE FRENCH. — SIR ROWLAND HILL'S MARCH TO TAGUR. — EXAMINATION OF MIRAHETE. — LETTERS TO LORDS WELLS AND WELLS — GENERAL WELLS' "WELL DONE TO SIR ROWLAND HILL." — ARAVACA. — SIR ROWLAND HILL MARCHES TO LORD WELLS — REPORTS. — SIR ROWLAND HILL REACHES THE RIVER OF OLD CASTILE. — CLOSE COMMUNICATION WITH LORD WELLS. — SIR ROWLAND HILL ELECTED MEMBER OF THE HOUSE OF COMMONS. — BOLLADA. — COMA. — WELLS' QUARTERS.

MAJOR CURRIE was received at head-quarters with a hearty welcome, as the messenger of the tidings from Alnaraz. His letter to Sir Rowland Hill will convey the best idea of the impression made by the services he had to report.

" My dear Sir, " Fuente Guinaldo, May 23, 1812.

" I arrived here at five o'clock yesterday afternoon, after very great fatigue and exertion. Lord Wellington expressed the greatest joy and satisfaction at what had been done: in a word, he seems fully to appreciate the merits of the troops and every body connected with the expedition. Foy, he says, has been prettily humbugged, and must now go round by the mountains. When I mentioned our small loss, and the extent of the enemy's establishments at Alnaraz, he said, ' Yes, Hill has done it well and ably: and I will send you to England; it will give you a step.' From letters which he received last night from Lord W. Erskine, and which he was not altogether pleased with, he said, 'he was afraid you would be hurried to stop Drouet before you completed the destruction of every thing at Almaraz.'

"Half-past nine o'clock. Lord W. has just repeated to me his orders that he will send me to England, and that I had better stop here until the arrival of your despatch. The officers and every body offer me thousand congratulations; and they are known to attach a great deal of consequence to your late services, and particularly to the manner in which, according to Lord W.'s own words, things have been uniformly managed.

"I have no time to say a word more, as the post is just going off, and I waited till the last moment for his Lordship's commands. Ten thousand thanks for the very kind and considerate manner in which you have put me in a fair way of promotion. I can never forget your brother's kindness neither. My dear Sir,

"Ever yours most faithfully,

"E. CURRIE.

"P.S. Lord W. asked me how I thought the garrison of Mirabete would get away. Could it not be starved out? and would it not have been well to have left something to blockade it? I mentioned the Guerilla force in the neighbourhood."

From Niza, on his way to England, Major Currie wrote again, —

"My dear Sir,

"Niza, May 1812, 5 o'clock

"Yesterday, after dinner, Lord Wellington took me on one side, and told me that he had received your despatch, and that every thing had been done that he could possibly have wished for, and that too in the most able manner. He had just received the news of General Perceval's untimely end, and appeared happy that he had something to send home occupy the public mind. He added, however, that it was necessary to make the most of every thing in England, and that he would not send off the despatch before Friday or Saturday, in hopes of hearing something satisfactory respecting

“The despatches are to be sent to me, open, at Stewart’s; and my Lordship cautioned me against the unfair questions which were put to people who go home in my situation. I left head-quarters last night at seven o’clock, and arrived here an hour ago (26 leagues). I am consequently very much fatigued, and am going to rest for a few hours before I set out for Gavoin. Your horse I have just seen; he looks sleek and fat as ever; and a Mr. Commissary Griffiths will deliver him to you about the 2d or 3d of June.

“I am not able to write to Clement for your commissions in London. In haste, my dear Sir,

“Your ever faithful servant,

“E. CURRIE.

“P.S. I presume Lord W. rested his hopes of the fall of Mirabete upon what you stated in your despatch, for I never held out any such expectation to his Lordship. I said last night that I trusted my verbal report corresponded with your despatch in the essential points; and he said, ‘Most perfectly so.’”

The reception of the news of this victory in England was highly flattering to Sir Rowland Hill, and the commendations of the Prince Regent, the Commander-in-Chief, and the Government. Lord Bathurst’s letter to Lord Wellington contained the following direction:—“Your Lordship will have goodness to take the earliest opportunity of conveying to Sir Rowland Hill his Royal Highness’s approbation of the distinguished skill, decision, and vigour displayed by Sir Rowland Hill on this occasion, of ■ firmness and intrepidity ■ eminently manifested in the reduction of the redoubt of Fort Napoléon by Major General Howard, and the officers and troops under his command. ■ am commanded by his Royal Highness to mark his satisfaction of the loss of officers and men being, comparatively speaking, ■ small, ■ especially ■ it appears that it is in ■ great ■ owing to the judicious arrangements made by Sir Rowland Hill previous to his making the attack." The Spanish and Portuguese authorities, the latter of which had conferred on him the Grand Cross of the Tower and Sword a few months previously, also expressed their admiration and gratitude.

This event at Almaraz put all the hostile army in motion. On the 25th Foy was at Truxillo, and sent ■ captain, named Guingret, with letters and money for the prisoners. In his letter to Sir Rowland, there is ■ passage which shows how annoyed the French were by the Guerillas. He wrote, — " M. Le Capitaine Guingret, ■ rend ■ avant postes de l'armée Anglaise ■ 50 chevaux. Je lui ai donné une escorte si considérable contre l'usage établi pour les parlementaires, parce-qu'il pourrait rencontrer ■ chemin des partis Espagnols peu familiarisés ■ les coutumes et les lois de la guerre." Foy's design ■ ■ succour Mirabete; and he was vigilantly watched by Hill, whose consummate prudence, with regard to him, appears in his communication from Merida, ■ the ■ of May, to Lord Wellington. He says, " I am inclined ■ think Foy will not remain long where he is. The enclosed Spanish paper, written by ■ intelligent man in observation, confirms my opinion respecting Foy's intention ■ to ■ other side of the Tagus by Arzobispo. I am also inclined to think the enemy will abandon Mirabete. I could easily oblige Foy ■ go ■ from Truxillo, but under present circumstances I do not think ■ would ■ advisable for me to go so far to my left; and ■ the other hand, adverting to Foy's situation, I do not ■ to take ■ my force ■ far to the right ■ Almandralejo. Therefore, for ■ day ■ two, I will halt here, which will give my troops ■ little rest, and time to mend their shoes, &c.; and in the ■ while, probably, I shall hear from your Lordship." Lord Wellington did not ■ this letter, "thinking it probable that Foy would ■ off again immediately," and gave this ■ ■ for not writing. Foy retired, but Drouet ■ at hand with instructions, if strong enough, to cut his way through Hill, to ■ the Tagus, and to occupy Foy's position. This became known to Lord Wellington by ■ of ■ intercepted letter from Joseph to Drouet, a copy of which ■ immediately forwarded to Sir Rowland.

■ M. le Comte D'Erlon,

■ Madrid, 31 Mai, 1812.

"Vous auriez ■ la marche du corps du Général Hill ■ Almaraz, ■ sa retraite au-delà de Truxillo, ou le Général Foy était ■ ■ 26<sup>me</sup> Mai.

■ Le Duc de Raguse me mande qu'il paraît hors de doute que ■ mouvement de l'armée Anglaise ■ promena vers le Nord, ainsi il rappelle ■ lui ■ division Foy.

"Si vous êtes assez fort pour combattre Hill, marchez-lui sur le corps, et venez passer le Tage au front de l'Arzobispo. Si vous ne vous jugez pas en état de le battre, accompagnez-le ■ ■ rive gauche.

"Si le Général Hill vous évite, et va passer le Tage, soit à Alcantara, soit à Mecca, pour joindre Lord Wellington, prenez, sans hésiter, la route la plus courte à l'Arzobispo, et passez le Tage.

“ Instruisez-moi de votre marche, et pensez, Monsieur Comte, que de l'exécution de ces dispositions dépend le sort des affaires en Espagne.

M. le Duc de Dalmatie en est instruit, mais dans tous les cas n'attendez pas ses ordres pour confirmer ses dispositions.

“ Votre affectionné,

“ JOSEPH.”

Drouet's designs gave little alarm to General, who observed to Lord Wellington on the 8d of June, “ If Drouet is not supported it will not be difficult for me to disturb him in his present position, and probably to destroy some of his magazines and fortified posts. On the other hand,” he added, with his usual caution, “ if Soult keeps within reach of him, it will not probably be advisable for me to adventure far.” In a postscript to the letter, from which this is an extract, he further developed his plans:—“ Two deserters are in from Drouet's corps, stating that the enemy are about to advance. I cannot, however, think it likely; nevertheless I shall be prepared, and have my corps collected in the following cantonments:—Almandralejo, Ribera, V. Franca, Fuente del Maestre, Los Santos, Penne Villemur et Zafra.” On the 4th intelligence was brought that Mirabete had been relieved with about 1000 men, and that the peasants were engaged in carrying water up to the fort. By the 7th he had moved his head-quarters to Fuente del Maestre, where he received instructions to occupy the position of Albuera in the first instance, if Soult should move into [redacted] in force. This Lord Wellington thought it probable [redacted] would do, with a view to move upon Sir Rowland [redacted] soon as his Lordship's own march was known; and he accordingly supplied reinforcements, with which Sir Rowland advanced [redacted] Zafra when Drouet [redacted] back. Penne Villemur's horse [redacted] detached from Llerena on the right flank, and General Slade, with [redacted] cavalry from Llera, [redacted] the left. "The Count," says Sir Rowland Hill, in his report to Lord Wellington, "having expressed a wish to make a reconnoissance from Llerena towards Azuaga, with a view of inducing the enemy [redacted] retire, in order that he might establish his advanced posts at those places, and requesting me to cover his left, I ordered General Slade to advance for that purpose by Llera, with instructions in writing not to commit himself in any affair of consequence, and to keep in constant communication with the Count." Lallemand happening [redacted] come forward with some horse, Slade, contrary to instructions, dashed furiously at them, and having gained a slight advantage, pursued them through a pass into a plain, where the hostile [redacted] made him pay dearly for his well-meant indiscretion. This affair gave much annoyance to Sir Rowland Hill, who had [redacted] alternative but to order a court of inquiry. He, however, sent Lieutenant Strenuwitz [redacted] an expedition, in which he effected the recovery of [redacted] of the prisoners.

Soult having reinforced Drouet, Sir Rowland retired [redacted] the 18th of June, and took up his position at Albuera, where the bones of many a fallen soldier were seen still bleaching ■ the ■■■■■. The opposing armies now gazed on each other as ■ pondering which ■■■■■ give the ■■■■■ blow. The English and French generals had ■■■■■ been directed to ■■■■■ their own judgment; ■■■■■ Sir Rowland Hill exercised a discretion which proved that he could calculate and refrain ■ well ■ dare and achieve. ■■■■■ seriously weighed all the circumstances of the case, and particularly their effects ■ the ulterior projects of Lord Wellington, to whom he sent ■ masterly letter, written on the 25th of June in the wood near Albuera, where he had posted his men, quite prepared for ■ attack if deemed expedient. Lord Wellington replied on the 28th, "■■■■ upon the enemy if you can with advantage. I should prefer ■ partial affair to ■ general one; but risk a general affair, keeping always ■ very large body in reserve, particularly of cavalry, rather than allow Drouet to remain in possession of Estremadura and keep you in check." On the receipt of this letter Sir Rowland proposed at ■■■■■ to advance against the enemy on the 2d of July. The French made a strong reconnoissance on the 1st, and drove in his outposts. The Conde de Penne Villemur ■■■■■ rather rash with his cavalry, and would have been overpowered, had not he been supported by ■ squadron of the 3d Dragoon Guards. Sir Rowland's subsequent movements are described in ■ letter to Lord Wellington after he left Albuera.

■ My dear Lord, "Los Santos, July 4. 1812, 9 p. x.

■ Early in the morning of the 2d ■ marched from the camp ■ Albuera to Santa Martha, where I learnt that Drouet had the main part of his army collected ■ Villa Franca and Fuente del Maestre, occupying Azuachal, Villa Alba, and Almandralejo with the greater part of his cavalry. Yesterday morning I moved forward towards Feria in two columns, the right and principal column marching by the great road near the mountain; the left, under Sir W. Erskine, consisting of light cavalry horse artillery, and one brigade of one of Portuguese infantry, marched upon Azauchal Villa Alba, which place he fell in with three regiments of the enemy's cavalry, and after skirmishing with rear guard, they back into the plain towards Villa Franca, where they remained dark. In this affair Sir William took four prisoners and killed seven horses, and wounded a few men; our loss being one man of the Hussars killed.

" This morning I found the enemy occupied a strong post Fuente del Macastre, with General Barrois's division of infantry, and having the whole of his cavalry in the plain; I therefore determined to make a march upon this place by the great road, which had the immediate effect of making the enemy abandon Fuente del Macastre. Drouet's infantry at the time retired from Villa Franca, taking the road through Ribera. I on a height about a league and half from Villa Franca; at sunset I saw the whole in march. I shall forward in the morning. Several deserters have come in: I think we cannot have had less than thirty in the of the last week.

" I have, &c.

" R. HILL.

" General the Earl of Wellington, K.B.,
 &c. &c. &c."

At daylight the next morning he marched in two columns, the right upon Usagre, and the left on Bienvenida. Soult remained at Usagre until he came up; and he him pass about three o'clock. On the 9th Sir Rowland was Llerena, whence he despatched interesting and important communication Lord Wellington.

My dear Lord,

Llerena, 9th July, 1812, 9 A.M.

Yesterday a courier arrived from Cadix with a despatch for your Lordship from Mr. Wellesley, dated the 2d instant. Mr. W. was good enough to ~~send~~ the despatch open for my perusal, with a request that the courier should not be detained. He accordingly set out about three yesterday evening. I think it likely, however, that he will ~~not~~ reach your head-quarters so soon as this letter; I therefore beg to mention to you that ~~the~~ principal contents of the despatch were respecting ~~the~~. It appears that he was near Gibraltar, with about ~~the~~ cavalry and 5000 infantry, ~~and~~ that he did not consider himself in sufficient force to make a diversion upon Seville, but ~~that~~ he would make ~~some~~ ~~movement~~ which ~~would~~ ~~have~~ the ~~same~~ effect, of drawing the enemy's attention from Estremadura. It also appears that the Regency had prepared ~~to~~ embark Ballesteros, and send him and his troops round by Ayamonte. Mr. W. did not think this measure advisable, ~~and~~ Ballesteros remains ~~at~~ Gibraltar.

Mr. W. sends intelligence from Seville, which agrees with what I had received. He also sends two intercepted letters from Soult to the French Government, the most interesting part of which is in cypher. Your Lordship will of ~~course~~ have received the intercepted letter of Joseph to Drouot, a copy of which I send. The intelligence I have received of the enemy's movements of the last ten days, indicates ~~the~~ intention of carrying Joseph's instructions into execution. I have officers in observation ~~at~~ different points, and expect hourly ~~to~~ positive information ~~at~~ this head, and shall ~~be~~ accordingly, keeping a look-out towards Cordova and Seville, as it appears ~~to~~ me that Ballesteros, ~~in~~ ~~his~~ present weak state, will not be sufficient to prevent Soult from sending ~~some~~ reinforcements ~~to~~ this quarter, should he ~~be~~ inclined.

I have, &c.

R. HILL.

P.S. I have just received intelligence, which I believe to be true, that Drouot was yesterday with his head-quarters at Zalamea, with the main body, having sent some troops by Berlanga and Assuagar. I shall move immediately in the direction of [redacted]

“General the Earl of Wellington, K.B.,
&c. &c. &c.”

Lord Wellington replied in the following terms:—

“My dear Hill,

“Ruada, July 13 1812, 1 P.M.

“I have received your letter of the [redacted] inst., 9 A.M., [redacted] you'll have observed from my letter of yesterday [redacted] I [redacted] anticipated the report expected from you, that Drouet would march [redacted] this direction. The King, from accounts received [redacted] night, appears to be collecting a large force at Madrid, particularly in cavalry; and [redacted] am apprehensive after all the enemy will be too strong for us. But we'll [redacted]

“Don't let any time be unnecessarily lost.

“Ever yours most sincerely,

“WELLINGTON.

“Lient.-General Sir Rowland Hill, K.B.”

The French, however, did not move; and Sir Rowland Hill apprised Lord Wellington that he thought Drouet would retire into the mountains if pursued, and that it did not [redacted] advisable to go further forward. He also stated that he had obliged Soult to withdraw his cavalry from Berlanga, and two other places which were occupied by the British advanced posts, while the principal part of the infantry [redacted] cantoned in Llerena. When Lord Wellington heard that the enemy were not carrying into effect Joseph's orders to [redacted] the Tagus, he expressed to Sir Rowland his hope that he [redacted] not detached the troops according to previous directions; the [redacted] to which was, that the steps taken were in entire accordance with his expectation. Rowland's next position was Zafra, where he moved in consequence of intelligence contained in three intercepted letters, that he might be in a better condition to act if attempts should be made to carry Joseph's instructions into effect.

The letter he wrote to Hawkstone from Zafra describes his anxieties at this time, and shows his readiness to oblige a courteous enemy:—

“ My dear Sister,

“ Zafra, July 28. 1812.

“ I thank you for your letters which you have been kind enough to write me. I hope Clement keeps you informed of what is passing in Estremadura; if he does, you will see we are not idle in this quarter. At this moment we are anxious to know what is going on with Lord Wellington's main army. We have not heard from thence for these last four days, and when the accounts came away the two armies were pretty near each other. During the operations in the North, Soult is giving us all the trouble he can. He has reinforced the Count d'Erlon's corps; and there is seldom a day we do not see some of his troops. Four days ago my cavalry gained an advantage over some of his. I think he must have lost about forty; our loss not more than eight or ten.

“ The accompanying letter is from the first aid-de-camp of Count d'Erlon, Colonel Salignac, to his brother, who is a prisoner at Whitchurch. Will you have the goodness to send him the letter; and if he wishes to send an answer back, I will forward it to Count d'Erlon's head-quarters. Colonel Salignac is reckoned a very good sort of man, and liked by the Spaniards much better than Frenchmen in general are. He has shown great attention to some of our prisoners; and I should have no objection to show some little attention to his brother, if circumstances would admit of it. I have had a letter from Monsieur Salignac, by which I see he writes and understands English perfectly well. It appears by the papers, that some of the French prisoners in England have behaved very ill ; ■ therefore conclude Salaiznac and others at Whitchurch are pretty closely watched : ■ will, however, forward a letter for him if he wishes it. Kind remembrance to all.

“ Yours ever,

“ R. H.”

From Zafra he moved to Villa Franca, where he received from Lord Wellington the intelligence of his victory [REDACTED] Marmont at Salamanca. On this [REDACTED] he offered the victor his congratulations, while he pursued his own course with consummate prudence and skill.

Drouet occupied the whole length of the Sierra near Hornachos, an exceedingly strong post ; and Sir Rowland thus expressed his [REDACTED] to Lord Wellington, for not attempting to drive him from it :—“ Considering,” he said, “ that the enemy’s force does not ■ present appear to be such as ought to keep me in check, I have felt anxious to dislodge them from this line ; but there are objections to so doing which have hitherto prevented my making any movement with that view. I do not think it would be advisable to make a forward movement without taking into consideration the prospect of my being able to hold the country I should gain ; and the enemy having already [REDACTED] force on the high Seville road, with [REDACTED] or 4000 [REDACTED] in Seville, and which might at any time threaten my right and rear, this would be very doubtful. The enemy has ■ retreat open to him either on La Mancha ■ Cordova, so that I could not, by moving round either flank of the Sierra, hope to cut him off, or [REDACTED] to distress him, if he chooses to fall back ; nor [REDACTED] I sufficiently positive as to his actual force to feel certain, in the event of taking up a favourable position, that I should be [REDACTED] to gain any important advantage [REDACTED] him. Therefore, for the present, I propose keeping the troops in cantonments, with as much reference as possible to their health and convenience, and shall watch for a favourable opportunity of acting. The Count D'Erlon's head-quarters being at Hornachos would rather indicate a forward movement [REDACTED] their part, and I shall be prepared accordingly. I [REDACTED] disposed to think, however, he has [REDACTED] such intention, but that his object is only to keep [REDACTED] in view." In the [REDACTED] letter he gave an account of a little skirmish between the outposts. A few days previously he had reported what Lord Wellington called "a very handsome affair" with the enemy's horse, on the 24th of July, by the division of cavalry under Sir W. Erskine. [REDACTED] time [REDACTED] so fully occupied that he had little leisure to write to his relatives in England; but this brief note from Zafra contains much in a few words:—

"My dear Sister,

"Zafra, Aug. 4. 1812.

"I wrote the accompanying letter last post-day; but owing to my being obliged to go out in a hurry, the letter was not sent. It is of little moment whether you receive [REDACTED] or not; [REDACTED] shall, however, go by this day's post. Since I wrote it we have received accounts of the defeat of Marmont's army [REDACTED] Salamanca. It has been a most glorious event, and I trust its consequences will be most advantageous to the cause. It appears, however, to have had very little effect [REDACTED] my immediate opponents. Count D'Erlon continues in a strong situation in my front, and Soult remains [REDACTED] Seville with about 4000, and more [REDACTED] great distance ready to move upon me should I follow Drouot. Therefore for the present I shall remain where I [REDACTED], and watch for a favourable opportunity of acting. Lord Wellington still continues advancing; and if he is able to keep his forward position, Soult will be ordered to reinforce the King. Indeed, I think Soult must quit this part of the country entirely if matters do not mend with them. Every thing looks well at present. The last accounts from the North of Europe are of the greatest consequence to us.

— Yours ever most affectionately,

“ R. HILL.

“ Clement writes a letter by this post: you will consider this as a mere memorandum.”

The movements of Drouet were still closely watched by Sir Rowland, and regularly reported to headquarters.

“ My dear Lord,

“ Zafra, Aug. 12. (noon) 1812.

“ Drouet has withdrawn his troops from Guarena; but he still occupies Hornachos, keeping the troops and baggage out of the town every night. I hope your Lordship has received the intercepted letter I [redacted] on the 8th, from Drouet to Jourdan, by which we see that on the 6th the former had received [redacted] official account of Marmont's defeat. We also see that Soult expected the King in Andalusia. The late glorious event must, however, frustrate [redacted] his intentions. Your Lordship will see by your returns that [redacted] continue very healthy. There was a little fever in the 50th. I have in consequence moved that regiment to Feira, which is reckoned a remarkably healthy place.

“ I have, &c.

“ R. HILL.

“ P.S. I have not heard from Seville [redacted] Ballesteros since my last.

“ General the Earl of Wellington, K.B.,
 &c. &c. &c.”

On the 13th Lord Wellington entered the capital of Spain, welcomed by tears of joy [redacted] the friend of the oppressed inhabitants, who hailed him as their deliverer; but they were so dispirited by their sufferings, that ■ heart remained in them for tumultuous exultation. From this ■ of one of the purest triumphs ■ resulting from arms, his active mind took ■ vey of the whole condition of the afflicted country. He first directed the blockade of Cadiz to be raised, expecting this would enable him to relieve Ballesteros and Sir Rowland Hill. Soon after, in consequence of the retreat of Joseph into Valencia, and the certainty that it ■ not intended to join the troops under Drouet to the army of the centre, while reinforcements under General Maitland had landed at Alicante, he ordered Sir Rowland ■ move ■ Drouet, to drive him out of Estremadura, if possible, and to threaten to enter Andalusia. At the time of receiving these instructions Sir Rowland informed his friends privately, "Soult is evidently a good deal alarmed, and is certainly about to move, and it is generally supposed he will retire by Granada. We are ready for a start whenever the period shall arrive for ■ to advance." On the 19th the enemy made ■ strong reconnoissance with nearly the whole of his cavalry, but only drove in ■ picquets, and then retired ■ trot towards Llerena. Sir Rowland observed to Lord Wellington, that his ■ proceedings ought to depend, in a great degree, on those of Soult. "If," he said, "Soult gets rid of ■ encumbrances, and remains at or near Seville in force, it will not, I should think, be advisable for me to follow Drouet far. I shall, however, give him every annoyance I can, and if circumstances permit I ■ make a direct ■ upon him to-morrow.* It was my intention to have surprised the post of Hornachos, but I find the troops which are there in the day, march out and bivouack at least a league from the town on the road. Therefore to have attempted to have surprised that place would, in my mind, have harassed my troops, and have been attended with no advantage." His further movements were thus detailed in a letter to England, dated Berlanga, August 31st:—"On the 27th my corps broke up from its cantonments at Zafra, and reached Assuaga and this place yesterday. The Count D'Erlon has evacuated Estremadura, and is in full march upon Cordova, at which place there is every appearance of a general union of the army of the South. I propose making an immediate movement to my left to the Guadiana, from which point I shall be in the way to make a movement to the Tagus, should it be necessary to form a junction with Lord Wellington. The joy of the people at this moment is great indeed, and I trust it will have the best effect." By a letter of the same date, sent by a trusty peasant in duplicate an account of the slowness and uncertainty of the post, he acquainted Lord Wellington that Soult, with his whole army, was making "a rapid and decided movement upon Cordova, with a view, probably, of uniting with the king." He therefore proceeded towards Medellin, Truxillo, and Almaraz, where he crossed the Tagus. As he passed the famous fortress of Mirabete, now evacuated by the French, he had the satisfaction to find that it would have been impossible to have escaladed it, for the outworks, it consisted of a circular tower, the door of which was half-way up, entirely beyond the reach of any ladder. "Hill's corps," the great commander of the army, deservedly raised to the rank of Marquis, "will soon be across the Tagus, and I shall have the whole army together, in close communication. The blockade of Cadiz is raised, Seville evacuated, and Soult retiring through Andalusia." Sir Rowland moved by Naval Moral, Oropesa, and Talavera, and Major-General Charles Alten placed under his command. On his route he despatched the following account to Hawkstone:—

* August 26th.

My dear Sister,

Cádiz, Sept. 1812.

"Soult left Granada on the 15th, and Ballesteros entered it on the 17th. Soult has taken the direction of Guadin Caravaca. Before evacuating Granada and Jaen, the works and guns destroyed by the French. Joseph is still at Valencia, but it is said he is going off to France. The castle of Consuegra has surrendered to General Elio. It was an important post for the enemy to occupy; and if it had fallen I should have attacked it. The whole of my corps on its march towards Toledo and Aranjuez: the head of my column will be the former town to-morrow.

"The enemy has evacuated the town of Burgos, Lord Wellington has carried some of the out-works before the place; castle, however, still holds out. Tom Burgos; he was quite well a few days ago, since the storming of the fort Burgos. I thank you for your letter of the of last month. Kind remembrances to

"Yours most affectionately,

"R. H."

reached Toledo the time he expected, and received a report from General Alten, who wrote as follows:—

" My dear General,

" Madrid, Sept. 29. 1812.

" I have the honour to transmit to you the enclosed, received from Don Carlos d'Espa<sup>ña</sup>, and from a gentleman who [REDACTED] been long employed by the Marquis of Wellington for the purpose of obtaining information. I also received yesterday, from an officer of the 1st Hussars, whom I had sent in front, a letter [REDACTED] Genesta, 25th instant, informing me that [REDACTED] instant King Joseph and Suchet had joined [REDACTED] Almanza, after having [REDACTED] demonstrations towards Alicante, and on the [REDACTED] advanced as far [REDACTED] Villar and Bonete towards Albacete. This officer also says that the advanced guard of Marshal Soult was, [REDACTED] the 14th instant, [REDACTED] Hellin, and [REDACTED] [REDACTED] expected he would form a junction with Suchet on the 27th [REDACTED] 28th instant. I have the honour to be,

" My dear General,

" Your very obedient and faithful servant,

" CHAS. ALLEN, M.-General.

" Lieut.-General Sir R. Hill, K.B., &c., &c."

The same information was sent to head-quarters, but Lord Wellington remarked on it to Sir Rowland, "The movements and intentions of Soult and the King do not yet appear to [REDACTED] to be quite clear." He also expressed his fears of not being able to take the castle of Burgos.

Sir Rowland's [REDACTED] impressions were given as usual in his family correspondence. He said, in writing [REDACTED] the 12th from Aranjuez, where he had advanced from Toledo, "The castle of Burgos [REDACTED] not taken when the last accounts [REDACTED] away. Lord Wellington tells me it is the most difficult job he [REDACTED] had in hand. Tom has his share of the fatigue, and [REDACTED] quite well when I heard from him on the 6th. In my last I told you that the armies of Joseph, Soult, and Suchet [REDACTED] united in Murcia and Valencia; they have approached a [redacted] to Madrid, their advance being [redacted] Albacete. If they do advance upon Madrid I think they will run great risks, though at the same time it does not [redacted] very unlikely that they may attempt it, either with the view of bringing Lord Wellington back from Burgos, [redacted] in hopes of getting hold of the capital again. If these three armies do not advance with their whole force they can do nothing; and if they do bring the whole they must abandon their possessions in Valencia, and will be followed by General Maitland, who is [redacted] Alicante, and Ballesteros, who is coming up by Granada from Seville. I wish we had possession of Burgos, and hope you will hear of its surrender by the time you receive this. I rode over to Madrid [redacted] few days ago: it is [redacted] beautiful city. You will [redacted] by the map that this place is on the Tagua, where I [redacted] tolerably well posted to stop King Joe should he try to return to his capital."

Lord Wellington's views and those of Sir Rowland Hill coincided in every particular; and though his Lordship sent him directions, he observed, "I write all this, as I always do, to provide for every event, not believing that these instructions [redacted] [redacted] all necessary." Nor [redacted] they; for in almost every instance he had anticipated his commander's intention; and whenever the peculiarities of his situation led him to deviate from the strict letter of his orders, that deviation [redacted] acknowledged to have been an improvement.

By the 18th of October he had sufficient intelligence of the proceedings of the enemy to be able to say in a private letter, "The King, Soult, and Suchet, having united their armies, are on the frontiers of U. and Valencia, and appear ■ be moving this way. It is certain that ■ considerable force is advancing towards Madrid; but I think it very doubtful whether they will attempt to force their way to the capital." This he also made known to Lord Wellington, who ■ commenced his famous retreat from Burgos, the siege of which place he raised on the 21st. Sir Rowland retired from the Tagus in order to join his Lordship, and ■ the 30th moved from the position of the Jarama and destroyed the bridge of Aranjuez. How he proceeded may be gathered from his correspondence with Lord Wellington:—

" My dear Lord,

" Aravaos, October 31st, Noon.

" I have just received your letter of the 29th. We ■ commenced our retreat yesterday, and it ■ my intention to have moved everything off by daybreak in the morning, but the failure of the mine at the Puente Largo obliged ■ to keep the troops ■ that point until after dark, when they also commenced their retreat; and I have ■ to think, that until daylight this morning the enemy ■ ignorant of our movement. It appears to have been the enemy's intention to have gained the bridge yesterday, ■ they had collected ■ considerable force in front of it; and after they discovered the failure of the mine they made ■ vigorous attempt to get possession of it, but ■ repulsed in ■ very handsome ■ ■ by the 47th regiment and ■ detachment of the 95th, under Colonel Skerrett, placed there by Lieutenant-General Cole, who had charge of the rear guard. The conduct of Colonel Skerrett and the detachment of ■ ■ ■ very conspicuous on this occasion. I am sorry to say they suffered some loss.

" A great part of the infantry will reach the Escorial this night, and I ■ endeavour ■ have others forward agreeably ■ your Lordship's expectations.

"I communicated your wishes to General Elio, and have received no answer to them; but General Alten tells me he believes ■ to be his intention to head the Tagus and pass by the enemy's rear.

"I have, &c.

"R. HILL.

"General The Marquis of Wellington, K.B.,
" &c. &c. &c."

The ■■■ morning found him at the Escorial, pressing on to join Lord Wellington, who congratulated himself ■■ having "got clear in ■ handsome ■■■ of the worst scrape he ■■■ was in." Sir Rowland sent an express, at ten o'clock, to headquarters, to say he had heard that four squadrons of the enemy had entered Valde Moro on the previous day. At night ■ report arrived from the officer in observation, that the advance of the French had entered Madrid; but at five o'clock the next morning it ■■■ signified that ■ Spanish officer, leaving that city at the ■■■ hour the evening before, had not seen them there. In the front of Lord Wellington they were very quiet, but had sent to Toro to repair the bridge destroyed by the British, and orders ■■■ given to Sir Rowland to send ■■ officer into the valley of the Tagus to observe their movements. He next ascended the Sierra de Guadarama, ■■■ which the passage was rendered easy by the excellence of the royal road. The ■■■ ■■■ magnificent — column defiling after column, all in sight of each other, through the road winding along the brown rocky mountain, studded here and there with thick coverts of fir-trees, or patches of the greenest herbage blending with silvery torrents darting down their beds, while below lay the wide plains of Old Castile, covered with towns, villages, and well-cultivated farms. Into these they descended, followed by the enemy, of which Sir Rowland immediately sent tidings to Lord Wellington.

" My dear Lord, " [REDACTED] Neava, Nov. 4, 1812 P.M.

" I have this instant received the enclosed report, by which it appears that four regiments of the enemy's cavalry and two regiments of infantry, were advancing this morning [REDACTED] the [REDACTED] of Guadarama [REDACTED] eight o'clock.

" I have no information of what may [REDACTED] moving in their [REDACTED]

" I shall continue my march, [REDACTED] far [REDACTED] the incumbrances of the sick and baggage will permit me, to Fontiveros, about which place I hope to have every thing collected to-morrow.

" I have, &c.

" R. HILL.

" General the Marquis of Wellington, K.B., &c. &c. &c."

The reply to this [REDACTED] that his Lordship did not think the enemy [REDACTED] following him in force, but had merely sent out these regiments to see what he was doing. From Fontiveros, which Sir Rowland reached on the 5th, he reported—" The enemy's column, which I mentioned to your Lordship by Lieutenant Hay, advanced this morning at nine o'clock. I could see them descend the heights, and I do not think the number which descended the hill could exceed from [REDACTED] to 10,000 men; but there [REDACTED] other troops in their rear. When I came away, [REDACTED] half-past two, about three regiments of cavalry advanced as far [REDACTED] Blasco Sancho, the remaining infantry halting about the bridge of Almaza." It turned out that the hostile cavalry which ■ shown itself ■ nearly ■ strong; and Sir William Erskine had withdrawn General Alten's horse from the Adaga, and brought them ■ to Fontiveros. Sir Rowland also thought of falling back, ■ the ground he occupied afforded no good position. His instructions were, "Do not allow the enemy to ■ too ■ you with ■ advanced guard. Move upon them immediately, and make them keep ■ proper distance." This, he said, he ■ quite ready to do. Sir Rowland ■ now in close communication with Lord Wellington, who was retiring on Salamanca, followed by Clausel, and he proceeded to Alba de Tormes. On the 9th at two o'clock A.M. his Lordship wrote to him from Salamanca — "I think you will do well to move in the morning to your left to Machacon with the second division, ■ cepting ■ British brigade, leaving Hamilton's division and that brigade at Alba. Take Slade's brigade and the Spanish troops and Portuguese cavalry with you, leaving Long's brigade looking out in front of Alba. Have ■ good garrison in the Castle of Alba. You should not load the mine of the bridge, because ■ must keep ■ communication with the garrison. If the enemy should attempt to ■ either of the fords of Huesta, fall upon the first who cross." His answer ■ speedily sent: it was ■ crisis of ■ ordinary interest.

■ Alba de Tormes, Nov. 9, half-past **■ **■

■ My dear Lord,

■ Your lordship's letter of two A.M. reached me about nine. The second division will commence its march as soon as possible, ■ proceed according ■ your directions. General

Howard's brigade remains here with General Hamilton. Captain Goldfinch is now employed in repairing the front of the lowest work of the castle, which had been destroyed by the Spaniards, and a garrison will be put into it. I do not know whether your Lordship has been at this place; I therefore think it right to mention that the castle, with only a small garrison without artillery, would but imperfectly cover the bridge, unless the town was held also, which would require a considerable force.

" I have, &c.

" R. HILL.

" General the Marquis of Wellington, K.B.,
&c. &c. &c."

At four o'clock on the same day he reported the advance of the enemy towards the river Tormes. By a quarter before six Lord Wellington replied that he had been at Alba, and asked for correct information respecting the garrison and castle. Almost the same time Sir Rowland transmitted to him the news that the enemy threatened the place. He added "The mine is all ready, and the powder at the spot, if your Lordship should think fit to give directions about it." He said, too, that he had "large bodies of cavalry and infantry moving the heights towards the village of Babalfuente." Lord Wellington's opinion was that the French could not take the town of Alba — did they; for when they made the attempt the 10th, they most gallantly repulsed by the troops under General Hamilton. Sir Rowland was himself on that day at Calvarassa de Abaxo, and continued to watch and report the manœuvres of the great force threatening the allies.

While proceeding to effect this junction with Lord Wellington, Sir Rowland received the flattering intelligence that he had been elected member of Parliament for Shrewsbury. ■■■ caused him to write home.

“ Rolleda, near Ciudad Rodrigo,

Nov. ■■ 1812, 8 A.M.

“ My dear Sister,

“ Last night three packets arrived ■ my head-quarters, two of which have been wandering about the country for some time. They contain all your interesting letters, and my father's, as well as the papers relative to the late election at Shrewsbury. It is my intention to answer the whole of them this evening, and to write to you more fully on all subjects, and send my letters by the post. This I send by a private hand, which sometimes travels quicker, but is often more uncertain than the post.

“ The public despatches will have informed you of the late events in this country. You may imagine that I have had my share of anxiety on the occasion.

“ The overwhelming force which the enemy had collected made it necessary for Lord Wellington to retire, and for him to send me orders to the same effect. Thank God, I completed my junction with his Lordship at Salamanca without any material loss, though pressed by a very superior force.

“ Lord W., I believe, would have made a stand on his old ground near Salamanca, but the enemy declined a contest there, and obliged Lord Wellington to quit it by marching round our right and towards our ■■■. The enemy's force collected is so superior to ours, being, it is supposed, near 90,000 men, with 200 pieces of artillery, that Lord W. thought it advisable to continue his retreat to this strong frontier, where ■■ are now cantoned, and where I think the enemy will not follow us, at least at present. The last five days they have done nothing. The dreadful weather ■■ have had has been very much against us, and our army has, I am sorry to say, suffered a good deal, particularly ■■ cavalry and horses. Clement is quite recovered. Tom was with us a few days ago; he wrote to you from Alba Tormes: and if you receive this before the post, tell Sir John and my brother I write to them by that conveyance. In

“ Yours ever,

“ R. HILL.”

The incessant occupations of this eventful march prevented his writing the letters he proposed until he reached Coria, where his whole corps directed to proceed the 28th. The scenery of his route was grand in the extreme; and he passed the lofty Sierra de Gata, and descended by the rugged road to the plain, the sun chased away the mountain mist, and displayed the lovely plains below. Sir Rowland's head-quarters were in the small town of Coria, beautifully seated on the river Alagon, having a cathedral and some interesting remains of Moorish tower and castle. At this place he did every thing in his power to make the winter quarters of his officers and troops comfortable, after their late privations and fatigues. He found time to write the promised letter to his father: —

“ My dear Father,

“ Coria, Nov. 30. 1812.

“ I enclose a few lines to the electors of Shrewsbury, expressive of my thanks for the honour they have done me in electing one of their representatives in Parliament, which I request you will take the earliest opportunity of communicating to them.

“ My present occupations have prevented from addressing the electors at that length which I otherwise might have wished, and the cause precludes from addressing myself individually to Mr. Burton and other gentlemen amongst electors, who have most particularly exerted themselves to procure my return. I am not, however, the less sensible of their kindness, and must beg of you or my brother to take an opportunity of personally assuring them of my gratitude.

"I beg you will accept my warmest thanks for your kindness and exertions on this occasion, and believe me to be, my dear Sir,

"Your ever dutiful son,

"ROWLAND HILL.

"Sir John Hill, Bart."

"I think," he said in another letter, "I shall be quiet here for some time." Lord Wellington had, in fact, disposed his whole army in cantonments, waiting only for the burst of spring and its supply of green forage, to take the field again with the largest and most efficient body of troops he could collect.

CHAPTER IX.

LORD WELLINGTON'S [REDACTED] — [REDACTED] OF RELIGIOUS [REDACTED]
 [REDACTED] IN THE [REDACTED] — [REDACTED] — [REDACTED]
 SOLDIERS. — SIR [REDACTED] HILL'S [REDACTED] [REDACTED] — [REDACTED] [REDACTED] OF IT. — LORD [REDACTED] [REDACTED] TO CADIZ. — [REDACTED] IN COMMAND. — [REDACTED] — [REDACTED] [REDACTED] [REDACTED]. — EFFECT ON THE [REDACTED] — OFFICERS' [REDACTED]
 — [REDACTED] PREVENTED. — BEJAR. — [REDACTED] ROBERTSON. —
 SIR [REDACTED] HILL'S ACCOUNT OF THE ENEMY'S [REDACTED] — [REDACTED]
 MARCHES. — DIKNER & FRESCO. — MARCH. — CASTLE OF [REDACTED]
 BLOWN UP. — [REDACTED] [REDACTED] ENTERS THE [REDACTED] OF VITORIA. — ROUTE [REDACTED] SIR [REDACTED] HILL. — SPLENDID SCENERY. — STARVING POR-TUGUESE. — BATTLE OF VITORIA. — PAMPELUNA. — APPROACH TOWARDS FRANCE. — SIR [REDACTED] ASCENDS THE PYRENEES. —
 THE FIRST TO DRIVE THE [REDACTED] OUT OF SPAIN. — [REDACTED]
 [REDACTED] OFFICERS. — [REDACTED] IN [REDACTED] OF "THE ARMY [REDACTED] SPAIN." — THE BATTLES IN THE [REDACTED] OF THE MOUNTAINS.
 [REDACTED] [REDACTED] OF THE CONFLICTS [REDACTED] THE PYRENEES. — [REDACTED]
 VALLES. — ST. SEBASTIAN. — SIR T. M. HILL. — SIR ROWLAND
 WATCHES THE [REDACTED] OF SOULT. — THE COMTE DE L'ABIS-PAL'S THIRST [REDACTED] GLORY. — [REDACTED] SNOW [REDACTED] THE MOUNTAINS.
 — LETTERS [REDACTED] SIR GEORGE MURRAY.

THE army had scarcely settled in winter quarters, at the beginning of 1812, before the appearance of Lord Wellington's memorable circular, relative to its discipline and its moral condition, created extreme sensation. There were many who felt it the more deeply, because conscious that the sweeping charges of irregularity it contained, were not applicable to their conduct. The troops under Sir Rowland Hill were restrained by his influence, from the excesses so feelingly deplored by the commander of the whole. If [REDACTED] pared also with French soldiers, the patience of the English under privations may be said to have been exemplary; though their wants pressed and temptations offered, they led away into occasional irregularities. Circumstances did undoubtedly times to tarnish their reputation; but the real secret of these evils the negligence of the men in power at home, to providing due religious instruction. The Gospel is the only genuine of virtue in the many, and the only check to the unblushing demonstration of the hideous qualities of the base minority, by whom in all great collections of men barbarous crimes are committed, out of which arises the ill report of the whole. In the army of Spain, the tradesmen, the manufacturers, the mechanics, the rural labourers of Great Britain, were all represented by the who for five and five years, maintained the supremacy of the British against the renowned soldiery of invading France; and the name of Hill naturally suggests the inquiry — what done for their spiritual welfare? What provision there throughout this long and life-destroying war, that they might worship God from Sabbath to Sabbath, or for their instruction in Divine truth, while in stationary camps in winter quarters? Where could they look for ministers to comfort and direct them, when perishing by disease wounds straw pallets in hospitals? Little, indeed, their advantages in these important respects; so little, so inadequate to the wide and mournful exigency of the case, that might be almost recorded as the honest reply. Nor was this melancholy destitution of the ■ of grace viewed with indifference by Lord Wellington, who twice made urgent representations to the government. It is true that ■ of these occasions he alleged that Methodism had appeared, and ■ spreading very fast in the army. Each time also he ■ pressed himself anxiously; but neither respect for ■ wishes, mercy to the souls of men, ■ dread of irregularity, which often acts when every other inducement fails, moved the ministry of that day to those efforts in the matter which were due to God, to the soldiers, and to the country. Undoubtedly, the efficient and active clergymen asked for by Lord Wellington, would have been far more desirable instructors than the instruments of another kind then appearing amongst the soldiers, to ■ them to reflection on the truths of religion; but, nevertheless, the leaven which spread amongst them at this period was hallowed, and the dispensation pregnant with mercy, ■ it ■ a rebuke to those who ought to have cared for their souls. The influence of a few pious individuals became extended, because their efforts ■ sincere. Men who cared for their eternal interests banded together to seek amongst themselves in private, the privileges they could not enjoy in public ministrations; and numbers of them breathed their last sighs upon the fields and in the hospitals of Spain, looking unto Jesus. Officers who during the campaign regarded these proceedings with disapprobation have, though deeply attached to our ■ excellent Church, with its order, discipline, and doctrine, since spoken of the leaven then working in the ranks with wonder and respect, and with grief ■ the apathy of the government and the ■■■■■ of thoughtless ■ licentious comrades. Whatever Sir Rowland Hill may have thought of these proceedings ■ the period referred to, it is certain he ■■■■ offered any opposition to them ; and his ■■■■ troops ■■■■ under ■ discipline marvellously efficacious, considering the sufferings they endured and the triumphs they won. No general ever used less severity, yet the fear of offending him acted ■ the minds of his soldiers far more effectually than the dread of punishment, which ■■■■ recklessly braved when unsparingly administered. An officer of his division wrote of him thus eloquently and justly in a recent letter : — “ The great foundation of all his popularity with the troops was his sterling personal worth, and his heroic spirit ; but his popularity was increased and strengthened as soon as he ■■■■ seen. He ■■■■ the very picture of an English country gentleman. To those soldiers who ■■■■ from the rural districts of Old England, he represented home — his fresh complexion, placid face, kind eyes, kind voice, the total absence of all parade ■ noise in his habits, delighted them. The displeasure of Sir Rowland ■■■■ ■■■■ to them than the loudest anger of other generals ; and when they ■■■■ anxiety in his face that all should be right, they doubly wished it themselves ; and when they saw his countenance bright with the expression that all ■■■■ right, why, they ■■■■ glad for him as well ■ for themselves. Again, the large towns and manufacturing districts furnished a considerable body of men to the army. Now these soldiers were many of them familiar with the [redacted] and character and labours of his pious and devoted uncle, Rowland Hill, who was, perhaps, of all the preachers of the Gospel in the past century, the [redacted] best known, best loved, and most talked about amongst the [redacted] people all over England. His sincerity, his boldness, and his many strange sayings and doings, [redacted] known and reported in the ranks; and the men did not like Sir Rowland the less, for being the nephew of this celebrated and benevolent individual. Also his kind attention to all the wants and comforts of his men, his visits to the sick in hospital, his vigilant protection of the poor country people, his just severity to marauders, his generous and humane treatment of such prisoners and wounded [redacted] at times [redacted] into his hands — all consistent actings of a virtuous and noble spirit — made for him [redacted] place in the hearts of the soldiery; and wherever the few survivors of that army may now be scattered, in their hearts assuredly his name and image [redacted] dearly cherished still.”

Coria, where Sir Rowland's winter quarters were established, [redacted] a favourite place with the officers, who passed their leisure time in coursing, shooting, and [redacted] variety of amusements which he liberally promoted. Lord Wellington's departure [redacted] business of importance to Cadiz left him in [redacted] most responsible situation. “Lord Wellington,” he says in [redacted] of his communications to his relatives, “having set off for Cadiz, the command of the armies is left in my hands. It is not his Lordship's intention to be absent more than [redacted] month. In the [redacted] while there does not appear any great likelihood of active operations. The enemy, however, ■ at no great distance, and it ■ possible ■ may have something ■ do." Sir Rowland also mentioned in the ■ letter, dated December 15, the appointment of his Lordship to be Generalissimo of the Spanish armies, which he considered " ■ likely to have the best effect notwithstanding Ballesteros's opposition to it." He further observed, "that General's conduct has been rather extraordinary. I have many letters from him, and indeed I have received one this day (of the 26th of October), expressing his anxious desire to comply with my wishes and Lord Wellington's, in which I believe him to have been sincere. But subsequently finding from his ■ government that Lord Wellington was to command him, Ballesteros said no."

On the 12th of January Sir Rowland wrote again. "I do not wish to be too sanguine, but there is every appearance of the enemy's army in this country being on the point of making a general move to the rear. They ■ to be fully aware that things are not going ■ well with them in Russia; but the troops in general are kept in ignorance as to the real state of affairs there. I have, however, endeavoured to set them right, and to let them know how matters stand, by sending to their outposts ■ copies of Lord Cathcart's late despatches. For ■ time past the enemy have been sending off their sick and raising immense contributions — ■ which indicate retrograde movement." Seven days later he stated, "The troops that ■ nearest to ■ marched off about ■ week ago, and appeared to be going to their rear; they have, however, taken the direction of Toledo, and been replaced in our front by troops from Astorga and Leon, the whole of that country having been evacuated by the enemy. Upon the whole, it appears that the French in this country, have collected the greater part of their force in the centre of Spain. I do not mean to say that they have brought troops forward from their rear, but have closed those [REDACTED] their flanks more to the centre. This may be [REDACTED] arrangement preparatory to retiring, or [REDACTED] measure of precaution; but I cannot conceive that it means any thing offensive on their part at present." The movements of the hostile forces at this time were viewed with great anxiety by the British officers; and it may be interesting to see a report at such [REDACTED] juncture sent to Sir Rowland Hill from officers in observation.

First Officer. "It is incalculable [what] the enemy are levying in all the villages. On the 7th 3500 [REDACTED] entered Madrid; the 8th they marched out for France. They took with them [REDACTED] convoy of 300 carts, and many persons made prisoners. In the hospitals at Madrid they have 756 sick; and they have given orders for [REDACTED] quantity of biscuit to be baked; it is not known for what purpose."

Second Officer. "On the 5th 1000 Polish cavalry marched from Madrid for France; [REDACTED] the 7th 4000 to 5000 infantry marched also from Madrid for France; on the 8th 400 cavalry marched for France; on the 9th also left Madrid [REDACTED] troops of the Confederation of the Rhine. Joseph has dismissed many domestics of the palace, and it is said he is going to Guadalaxaran. On the 11th 800 [REDACTED] left [REDACTED] for France. Count D'Erlon is at Agreda, Soult's head-quarters at Toledo, with 4000 ■■■■■. The enemy continue their exactions of enormous contributions.

“On the 21st every thing ■■■ quiet ■ Talavera, when in the night ■ officer arrived, which produced a great bustle. An embargo was laid ■ all transports, and all the posts were called in. The idea amongst the people ■ Talavera and the French troops was, that they ■■■ going to retire in consequence of the accounts from the North of Europe.”

These reports, when they ■■■ found to have ■■■ from the enemy, Sir Rowland treated with due ■■■ picion. He made ■ tour of inspection to his own posts northward, and found them generally healthy and in ■ satisfactory state. Measures also were taken by him to prevent the French from plundering Placentia, where the inhabitants were in great terror from ■■■ of their approach. He next had what he called “a little affair, which he had no doubt would be magnified in England.” This happened at Bejar, and he gave his own version of it thus: — “The enemy have for ■■■ time been plundering the neighbouring country in ■ most shameful manner; and in order to protect ■■■ of the towns, I moved troops forward, and placed two regiments in Bejar, ■ large town, the most advanced. On the night of the 19th the enemy collected about 12,000, and made ■ night march upon Bejar, in hopes of surprising the garrison. Our troops were, however, on the alert, and repulsed the enemy.” On this occasion he reported with great pleasure to Marshal Beresford, the gallant conduct of the Portuguese.

About this time Sir Rowland added to his staff ■■■ officer who ■■■ destined to be his companion, ■■■ tary, confidant, and friend to the last moment of his public life. This estimable man was Captain Egerton*, of the well-known and respected Cheshire family of the same ■■■. Sir Rowland had by the permission of Lord Wellington taken him ■ extra aid-de-camp, and thereby contributed to the happiness of his circle ■ Coria, as well ■ to the advantage of the public service.

As spring advanced, the chieftains of the British army glowed with anticipations of their coming successes, and collected the most accurate accounts they could obtain of the enemy's force and proceedings. A letter from Sir Rowland Hill to his father shows what intelligence they had obtained.

“ My dear Father,

“ Coria, ■■■ 23. 1813.

“ Yesterday Captain Erskine ■■■ here, and left your letter of the 28th of January. What you have said to Lord Erskine on the subject of Lord Buchan's attention to ■■■ is perfectly correct, and I trust I need not say that I shall ■ every account be glad to show ■■■ any attention in my power.

“ The enemy have withdrawn their troops from La Mancha, and I ■■ inclined to think they are about to evacuate Madrid, perhaps not with the intention of quitting Spain altogether, but ■■■ with the view of concentrating their troops in the direction of Valladolid. They continue to exact ■■■ contributions in every part of Spain they occupy; and I have been kept a little on the alert of late, in order to preserve the neighbouring country from being plundered by them.

“ I believe I have got pretty correct returns of some of the French armies; and as I know you are much interested in all military matters, I ■■■ ■ memorandum from them for the private information of the Hawkstone family: —

* ■■■ Colonel Egerton, of Eaton Banks, ■■■ Tarporley.

"The army of Portugal, as it is called, is commanded by the Comte de Reille, aid-de-camp to the Emperor, and consists of 8 divisions; 8 generals of divisions; 11 generals of brigade; 31 regiments of infantry, amounting to 31,256 infantry.

"Cavalry. — 1 general of division; 2 of brigade; 9 regiments, amounting to 17,750. Artillery, 1775.

"The above army is cantoned in Avila, Valladolid, Toro, and Salamanca.

"The army of the South, lately commanded by Soult, is now commanded by the Comte de Gazan, and consists of 8 divisions of infantry, amounting to 30,785 men; 3880 cavalry; and 1000 artillery.

"This army has its head-quarters at Toledo, and is immediately in front of my corps.

"The army of the Centre is commanded by the Comte D'Erlon, Drouot, has its head-quarters at Madrid, and amounts to 7081 infantry, and 4022 cavalry, besides artillery.

"The army in Valencia, from 13,000 to 14,000, is commanded by Suchet.

"The army of the North, I believe, does not exceed 12,000.

"The above includes all the sick, and those made out before Marshal Soult left the army for France, taking with him the selected officers and men to complete the imperial guards. I do not know the exact number he took with him, probably eight or ten thousand.

"With respect to our army, I believe it is very effective. The second division of infantry is very strong in the present, and the cavalry is recovering from their weak state. I am induced to think the enemy have sent reinforcements into Spain."*

The British forces at this time were in a state of great efficiency, and Sir Robert Chambre Hill, the brother of Sir Rowland, was highly commended by Lord Wellington for his efforts in the household brigade of cavalry, which he commanded. As the month of April drawing to a close, Sir Rowland sent word to his friends, "All troops in the closing up to be more à portée to the movements we may have to make, and I imagine by the time you receive this that the whole will be moving forward." He said also, "If it be the enemy's intention to quit this country in advance, they would be taking the steps they are now adopting. It is, however, possible they may make a stand; but I do not think it will be before we get to the Douro or the Ebro. Our army is in very fine order, and never more effective since we have been in the Peninsula. That of the enemy cannot be so strong as it was; for although they have received about 7000 recruits, they have of late sent to France upwards of 20,000 of their best men, and a great number of officers."

* This letter, like some others, had no signature.

In the long marches which Sir Rowland's troops had to make, and during the various halts which occurred, he endeavoured to afford them all the relief in his power from the monotony of camp life. The whole corps concentrated at Galisteo on the 4th of May, where it remained till the 21st. While here the 28th Regiment, which had signalized itself in Albuera, determined, on the 16th, the second anniversary of that battle, to give a dinner to Sir Rowland and the Staff of the second division. But they had neither tables nor chairs. This did not deter them from their purpose, and ingenuity, wanting where there is inclination, invented a mode of giving a banquet al fresco. Lieutenant Irwin selected the [redacted] and most [redacted] piece of turf he could find, on which he marked out the due length and breadth of a table for no less than one hundred guests. The turf was carefully pared off, and a trench was dug round it large enough for [redacted] the company. The table [redacted] formed in the centre, of the sods and mould duly levelled and excavated to give ample room for the legs, and then the green turf [redacted] once [redacted] gently laid on, and supplied the place of a table-cloth. Each officer invited [redacted] desired to bring his own knife, fork, and plate, and not to be particular about having them changed. The cookery [redacted] of the substantial order, the heavy artillery of field cuisines. There were ponderous joints roasted and ponderous joints boiled; there [redacted] soup in abundance, in which the shreds of meat gave assurance that it was, at least, unsparingly concocted; there were pies baked in camp-kettles turned upside down, of dimensions and quality Friar Tuck would not have disdained. Then came the cordial welcome of the chief guest, the [redacted] who never had [redacted] enemy but [redacted] public grounds, whose bland smile set the company at ease, while his genuine dignity prevented in his presence every word and every act that did not perfectly become it.

It [redacted] nearly the end of May before Sir Rowland's corps arrived at Salamanca. As they crossed the plains that lay in their road, the officers let loose their greyhounds to [redacted] the hares along the columns, and many of them [redacted] [redacted] in the midst of the marching ranks. By the 4th of June they [redacted] near Burgos. On the 12th, [redacted] five o'clock in the morning, Sir Rowland's corps moved forward in two columns, the right ■ Celada, the ■ on Hornillo. The enemy, after skirmishing ■ little to favour the retreat of the main body of their rear-guard, retired up the heights above Hornillo. There, for ■ time, they presented a front to the pursuing British; but, at length, being alarmed, they passed the river Arlanzon, and joined Reille, the entire body taking the road towards Burgos. At early dawn on the 13th the picquets left ■ the heights, ■ the distant castle of Burgos enveloped in a thick white smoke, followed by ■ tremendous sound. The French themselves ■ destroying the fortress which baffled the genius of Wellington, and resisted his victorious army. In a few minutes more came a second explosion; shortly all ■ again clear, and the yawning ruins told their ■ tale.

At length King Joseph brought his army and all its appurtenances into the basin of Vittoria. In that direction Sir Rowland's troops passed ■ with the rest, and no particular event interrupted their march. The Asturian mountains were ■ their left. The scenery on their route ■ worthy of the ■ and of Spain. One portion of it is beautifully described by Major Moyle Sherer. He says, "On the 16th ■ descended by ■ steep and rocky road into ■ low ■ cluded valley, through which the Ebro, here narrow and inconsiderable, winds its way, and crossing the river by a stone bridge of five arches, turned to the left, and followed ■ road running for nearly two miles along the bank of the Ebro, and almost ■ a level with its waters. The view of this valley ■ your descent to it, the vale itself, and the singularly picturesque road by which you pass out from it, are amongst the [redacted] enchanting [redacted] it has [redacted] [redacted] to my lot to contemplate. Here you may imagine yourself transported to the happy retreat described in Rasselas. On every side mountains enclose and shelter this favoured spot; all the passes leading to and from it [redacted] concealed from you; the fields [redacted] teem with cultivation, and the orchards all blush with fruit. The ash, the beech, and the poplar, the woodbine, the rose, and a thousand shrubs shade and adorn the rural dwellings. The narrow wheel tract by which you leave this elysium runs curving at the foot of impending precipices, so bold and varied in their forms and the character of their beauties, that no pen could describe them justly. Here they [redacted] clothed with rich and shaggy brushwood; there naked to their blue or grey summits, which frown above you: and here, again, from the rude clefts and fissures of the rock grow solitary trees and plants, where no hand [redacted] ever reach them, while in some places thick wreaths of ivy half cover the projecting crags. The river brawls along between these cliffs, often impeded by huge [redacted] of mountain stone, which have fallen in [redacted] wintry storm [redacted] been detached by [redacted] violent convulsion of nature, and now form islands in its bed. In a scene so lovely, soldiers seemed quite misplaced, and the glittering of arms, the trampling of horses, and the loud voices of the men, appeared to insult its cheerfulness." The bivouacks here for the next three days were delightful beyond all conception, and those that had food [redacted] cheerful and contented. But the poor Portuguese were, by [redacted] of the negligence of those appointed to supply them with provisions, in a starving condition; ■■ that, notwithstanding the stern but just command of Lord Wellington that they should look to their legitimate ■■■■■■ for their support, Sir Rowland could not refrain from addressing him ■■ their deplorable state.

" My dear Lord,

" Barquiseda, June 20.

" I am sorry ■■ have occasion to address your Lordship again ■■ the subject of provisioning the Portuguese division under my orders, after the instructions which I have received from you; but they ■■ ■■ present in ■■ destitute ■■ ■■■■ ■■■■ I ■■■ it my duty to make your Lordship acquainted with it. They for ■■■■ days have been on very reduced rations. The day before yesterday they had only three quarters of ■■ pound of meat, and yesterday nothing, and have no prospects for this day. To give them bread I am ■■■■ is out of the question, but I beg to know whether your Lordship will permit me to give them ■■■■ meat?

" I have, &c.

" R. HILL.

" Marquis of Wellington, &c. &c."

This application was irresistible, and elicited the following reply:—

" June, 20. 1813, half-past 1 ■■ ■■

" My dear Hill,

" I have just received your note of this morning. You may assist the Conde d'Amarante as you please, but let the Conde know that it is an exception to a rule to which I am determined to adhere, and that he must make his commissaries ■■■■ themselves.

" Ever yours ■■■■ faithfully,

" WELLINGTON.

" Lieut.-General Sir R. Hill, K.B., &c."

On the morning of the 21st hints from staff-officers, bustle in the bivouacks, the saddling of Sir Rowland's charger, and other significant proceedings, indicated that something was expected to go beyond the ordinary events of a march. The moving masses of General's division excited about nine o'clock by skirmishing in the mountain, and a league farther on, the defile formed by the high lands and the river opened to their view the splendid sight of the hostile army, all in battle array, with the spire of Vittoria in their rear. There were 70,000 fighting and 100 pieces of artillery opposed to the advancing allies, who were disposed by Lord Wellington in three corps. The right commanded by Sir Rowland Hill; two columns in the centre received orders from the chief himself; and the left placed under Sir Thomas Graham. Sir Rowland commenced the work of victory; and the first fruits of his exertions were the heights of La Puebla, gained to him by Spaniards well led by Murillo. This advantage was maintained in spite of great efforts on the part of the enemy, but at the cost of the life of the brave Cadogan, when the British soldiers were brought into the fray. The possession of the important village of Subijana de Alava next rewarded the skill and efforts of General. The hostile troops filled the ravines in the heights above, and in the wood on the left, and struggled, with ordinary fury, to recover the ground they had lost. The allies in front of the wood suffered greatly, till the head of a column sent by Sir Rowland along the lofty ridge which descends from the Puebla Mountain, fell irresistibly upon the flank of the French. Coincident with this skilful movement, the energetic operations of Cole, Picton, and Dalhousie. At length the four divisions formed quickly on the left of the Zadarra, and advanced against the right and centre of the enemy. Their ■■■ gave way under the ■■■ successful flank attack of Hill, who followed up the retreat with his customary vigour and decision. At last the entire French army ■■■ driven back by the allies in one helpless confused mass, flying like ■ frightened mob, and leaving their cannon, with all the rich, curious, and ill-gotten spoil of the usurper Joseph. Nothing ■■■ wanting to the most decisive victory ■■■ Wellington had then ■■■ gained, except more prisoners; but they fled so fast, King, Marshals, Generals, and men, that the allies, who had been sixteen hours under arms, and had marched three leagues since the day dawned, had no chance of overtaking them. Many, also, could not resist the temptation of stopping to revel in the unprotected treasures of the fugitives which covered the ground — ■ heterogeneous wreck of hoarded plunder. Some soldiers, and the followers of the army in general, thickened upon the spoil like bees upon the honeycomb of some prostrate hive, and seized it with tumultuous exultation. They hung in clusters ■■■ the cars, waggons, and carriages, scrambled for the money scattered from the chests, searched the gilded coaches of the court, and drew forth, with shouts, robes, uniforms, court dresses, stars, jewels, plate, pictures, ■■■ the pride of the grandees and hierarchy of Spain. One solitary gun, and ■■■ howitzer, were ■■■ that ■■■ carried away in the headlong scamper of the overthrown army. Even the baton of Marshal Jourdan ■■■ left ■■■ the field, for which the champion who laid it ■ the ■ of his prince, received that of England in exchange.

Lord Wellington had foreseen this great victory, and kept the secret in his own breast. While near Medina, four days before the battle, Captain Clement Hill observed, in writing to his friends, "England will, I think, be ■ little astonished ■ ■ rapid march. The whole of ■■ army got over the Ebro yesterday, and continues to advance. What Lord Wellington's plans are I believe nobody knows but himself. We all feel confident of great success, and you may expect to hear of the French being fairly turned out of Spain. We have driven them so far almost without the loss of a man, and they find themselves completely out-manuvred. After they destroyed the Castle of Burgos, ■■ did not venture to march in the line by which they retired; but, by rapid marches to our left by a difficult road which they could not have expected us to attempt, we crossed the Ebro before them, and expect to continue moving, and get between them and their communication with France, which will bother them a good deal."

The forces of Reille, which rallied on the 22d at Salvatierra, ■■■ found the pursuers ■■■■ approaching; and the next day Captain Clement Hill wrote to Hawkstone: — "Salvatierra, 23d June, on the road from Vittoria to Pampeluna. — I hope you will receive this in good time to assure you of the safety of the four brothers after the battle of Vittoria. We ■■■ all ■■ this moment together in the ■■■■ room, and in perfect health. I have not time ■■■ to send you ■■ account of all that happened during the action. Never was an army more completely routed and defeated than the French. Rowland's corps was principally engaged during the first part of the action, and have suffered more than any other. The Blues were in the fire but not engaged. Tom had a good deal to do, which was well done."

The next duty which Sir Rowland employed was the blockade of Pampeluna. He received a letter of concise and able directions from Lord Wellington.

"My dear Hill,

"Casada, June 28. 1819, 8 P. M.

"I am anxious that a more close and strict blockade of Pampeluna, and I suggest the following for your consideration.

"First, that the water which supplies the town by the aqueduct should be cut off. It will not be difficult to effect this object without mischief to the country, by cutting the aqueduct at any place which there may be a channel through which the water might pass.

"Secondly, in order to complete the annoyance of this measure, it will be necessary to establish posts upon the river, and fire day and night at any persons who may approach for water. These posts should be covered by a trench; a redoubt should likewise be constructed at the distance of musket shot from each of the bridges; each to hold a sufficient number of men to support the posts on the river, in case the enemy should make a sortie upon them. There should be a gun or two in each of these redoubts, which we can bring from Vittoria.

"Thirdly, there is a wood to the westward of the place, on the same side of the river, and that should be examined, and if possible an abattis should be formed in it to protect the blockade on that side, which should be brought as close as possible.

"Fourthly, the remainder might be occupied by pickets at the usual distance communicating well with each other, having support in hand in redoubts armed with artillery.

Fifthly, measures should be taken without loss of time to cut and carry away, or if that cannot be done, to burn the corn between the posts and the place. These measures must be well considered, and must not be allowed to fail.

“ I beg that all this may be done without loss of time, and the sooner it is done the sooner I shall be able to relieve your troops entirely from this blockade, and give it in charge to the Spaniards.

“ I don't think we shall be able to do much against Clausel. He has passed Tudela on his march to Saragossa. I propose to try him on the road to Jaca.

“ Ever yours most sincerely,

“ WELLINGTON.”

The four gallant brothers were now constantly meeting each other, and one or other of them deputed to convey tidings of events to their family. From Orcoyen, two miles from Pampeluna, July 1st, 1813, Mr. Clement wrote:— “ We have been four days investing Pampeluna with Rowland's corps, which we expected to have had the siege of had there been one, but I believe it is determined only to blockade the place, and I am not sorry we are relieved from that tiresome duty by other divisions. Tomorrow we push towards the frontier, and I hope, in a few days, to write from France. We move towards San Estevan: General Graham is also in that direction. Lord Wellington will be here to-day, but we imagine will not remain long, and leave the blockade to the Spaniards. The army so gloriously beat Vittoria has been in France days. They ran so fast, having lost every incumbrance, even their last gun, that we made but few prisoners on their retreat. Lord Wellington, with four divisions, has been some days in chase of a French corps under General Clausel, which was prevented joining the main army in time for the battle of Vittoria. He could not catch them, and retires from the pursuit to-day. They will probably join Suchet's army. We ■■ in the most delightful part of Spain I have ■■■ ■■■ for summer; but it must be bad in winter. The weather has been quite cold even now, and for the last fortnight almost constant heavy rains. The country is very mountainous, with fine valleys covered with corn and good villages. We get well supplied with every thing: amongst the luxuries, excellent French butter. The Blues are at Logrono on the Ebro, and I fancy will not ■■■ up at present, ■■ cavalry are not of much use in the country ■■ are in."

From the day on which this letter is dated till the sixth, the corps of Sir Rowland Hill ■■■ constantly skirmishing with the enemy, but always drove them from their various positions. Still he found time amidst these mountain conflicts, to write hastily to Hawkstone.

"Lana, three leagues from France, July ■ 1813.

"My dear Sister,

"I am told that a mail will be despatched in the morning ■■ Santander, for England, I therefore avail myself of the opportunity of sending you ■ few lines. The public despatches and the letters from ■■ brothers, will have informed you of ■■ late proceedings in this country. Nothing could have been better managed and executed than our recent operations, and there is every prospect of our doing well, provided ■■■ ■■ on tolerably in Germany.

"The enemy in this country have halted on the frontiers of France. The country they occupy is strong, but they do not appear to have taken up ■ position to risk another battle.

If we can get a good position on the frontiers of Spain, I imagine we shall be satisfied for the present. To-morrow I expect to be with my corps on the borders of France. ■■■ of my people are ■■■ this moment at Arriège, which village is in France.

"The enemy have left a good garrison in Pampeluna: it is a strong fortress, and ■■■ is said that it is well supplied with ammunition and provisions.

"I have now the pleasure to inform you, that your four brothers in this country are well. Tom, as usual, has had his share of the fatigues and fighting; he and his regiment have invariably conducted themselves well. Clement is with me, and ■■■ tells ■■■ he wrote to Hawkstone two days ago; he is not looking very stout, but is well. Robert, whom I saw about ■■■ week ago, is in perfect health. Lord Wellington is much pleased with the conduct and appearance of the Blues. This not being a cavalry country, Robert and his brigade are, I believe, to remain, for the present, in the neighbourhood of Vittoria.

■   ●   ●   ●   ●   ■   ■   ■   ■

"Ever yours, most affectionately,
"R. H."

On the sixth of July the French ascended the ■■■■ tain which forms the key of the entrance into the valley of Bastan, and took possession of it. The next day Sir Rowland first encountered the lofty steeps of the Pyrenees, and ■■■ met by Lord Wellington. They had been reconnoitring together the previous evening, and orders had been issued for dislodging the French from their several positions; but on this ■■■ occasion ■■■ dense fog veiled the enemy from their view, and they spent the night amidst the mountain mist, sharing the fatigues and privations of the ■■■■. From the pinnacles of this ■■■■ of mountains Wellington exhibited to Europe the full grandeur of his plans ; and Sir Rowland Hill, who gave the first check to the French cavalry in Egypt, had now the honour of first driving the soldiers of Bonaparte from Spain. This he accomplished on the 8th of July, and took possession of the various passes of the Puerta de Maya. Often have these achievements been acknowledged and commended ; but I believe they will yet be enhanced in public opinion by the simple unaffected way in which they were announced by his brother, to those who anxiously awaited news from the Pyrenees at home. On the 9th of July he wrote from Elizondo : — “ We have gone through a very interesting part of the campaign, having completely driven that part of the French army to which we were opposed over the Pyrenees. Great part of Rowland’s corps being detached from him, his force has been inferior to the enemy’s, and they have always had the advantage of strong positions. The troops have been engaged, more or less, with us hard fighting every day for the last five days ; but I do not think, during that time, we have lost more than a hundred men. The last position they took was in the pass of Maya, which is very strong. We were to have attacked them yesterday morning. However, at daylight, we saw the last of them coming from the pass. Our troops pursued them, and we had the pleasure of seeing them driven out of Spain.” He continued : — “ We have been marching constantly over mountains rising amidst some of the finest valleys I ever saw, with good towns ; and the people in some part of Spain have appeared more happy to see the English. I think we had one of the finest sights yesterday I saw, on arriving a high hill, from which, for the first time, we had an extensive view into France, and the French driven into it." All the officers of merit in Sir Rowland's corps experienced almost equal joy with his own brother, at the honour thus gained by their General; and such regard for him his just due, for he had looked upon their reputation his own. There exist two letters written at this time, illustrative of his consideration towards them, that I cannot refrain from inserting them. The first written to a distinguished general officer on Lord Wellington's staff, who had made a complaint, the nature of which will be sufficiently apparent in the letter itself:—

"My dear General,

"Elisondo, July 9. 1813.

"I have received your letter of yesterday relative to the orders given for the march of the Caçadores, and on the subject of the interference which you say you have experienced from my — and —. The order given by — yesterday, for the march of the whole of the Caçadores, instead of part of that corps as previously ordered by me, was in consequence of information he had received, of which he was before ignorant. His having done so, which he reported to me immediately afterwards, met my entire approbation. Having spoken to — on the subject, he begs me to explain to you that the circumstance of his not having communicated the order for the march of the Caçadores direct to you, proceeded entirely from a wish to execute the order with as little delay as possible, not knowing that you had returned to your quarters, and a desire to lose as little time as possible in carrying into effect the movement of the Caçadores, which, from the report he received, was certainly required.

"With regard to the interference of the two staff officers above mentioned, in general, I cannot say that I am aware of having ever been improperly exercised, or of inconvenience having arisen to the service from it. I certainly by no means wish the staff officers attached to me to be giving orders to their superiors in their own name, but there are times when the superior staff officers who are acquainted with my views and intentions may, with advantage to the service, give orders in my name, and they have my authority to do so, acquainting me, of course, by the earliest opportunities of their having done so, and being responsible to me for the same. Indeed, I am sure if staff officers were to be only the mere messengers of my orders, they would be of little advantage to me. By the situations they hold, I consider them to be officers of discretion, and, as far as I am at present aware, I think you will find that the same degree of interference which is exercised by them, is exercised by the officers at the heads of their departments in this and most other armies. In saying these staff officers are not to give orders in their own name, I must make an exception. With what concerns the details of their own department they are responsible for those details, and I conceive they may communicate in what manner they please with the officers acting under them. I write this in ignorance of the particular instances of the interference of my — and — which have led to your complaint. I beg leave to assure you, however, that I shall be ready to attend to any further representations you may have to make on this or any other subject.

“I have, &c.

“R. HILL.”

The next letter addressed to Lord Wellington himself in defence of an officer of lower rank, who imagined he had fallen under his Lordship's displeasure.

“My dear Lord,

“Elizendo, July 10. 1813.

“I only yesterday received the enclosed letter from — and although it did not appear to me from the conversation which I had the honour to have with your lordship on — subject, that you felt any displeasure towards — on the occasion alluded to by him, I think it my duty ■ justice to that officer to state, that the very moment your instructions for the closer investment of Pampeluna were received, he proceeded to make the necessary examination of the ground, and reported to me without loss of time. And if there was any improper delay in carrying your lordship's wishes into effect, it rested entirely with me, and I feel myself fully ■ with ——'s desire to exert himself on that occasion, and should be sorry if your lordship thought otherwise.

"I have, &c.

" R. HILL.

" Marquis of Wellington,
&c. &c. &c."

The perusal of these letters will be the best possible clue to the sentiments entertained towards one, who ■ looked upon as the friend of his officers and the father of his troops.

On the 11th Lord Wellington, having ■ to think that the whole army of the South between Ainhou and Urdax was in Sir Rowland's front, instructed him to examine the passes of the hill from the high road, and to open a way for the artillery along the height to the post which had, on the 7th, been occupied by General William Stewart. His ■ tual situation and proceedings ■ stated in his reply to his Lordship: —

" My dear Lord,

" Elizondo, July 12. 1813.

" Yesterday I had the honour to receive your letter of the 11th, @ A.M. The enemy are certainly in force in front of the Maya Pass; but it did not appear yesterday that it ■ been increased since the day your Lordship saw them from the heights.

" The peasants say the King arrived ■ Ainhou yesterday.

I have directed all the roads and communications mentioned in your letter to be examined and repaired without loss of time.

" I have, &c.

" R. HILL.

" Marquis of Wellington."

On the very day this letter was penned, Soult took command of the three armies now organized into ■■■ body, and called the army of Spain. Lord Wellington two days after was at San Estevan, whence he thus addressed Sir Rowland ■■■ relative to his movements and designs:—

" My dear Hill, " St. Estevan, July 14. 1813, 7 P.M.

" I arrived here this afternoon, and have opened your letter to Murray.

" It would appear that the enemy have reinforced their left towards St. Jean de Pied de Port; and I should besides conclude that Clausel, who was in the valley of Anso on the 9th, has by this time passed on to Oleron, and is in communication with St. Jean de Pied de Port.

" I ordered General Clinton two days ago to march to Lanz with the 6th division, where I believe he has arrived this day; and I have ordered Sir Lowry Cole with the 4th division, to move from the blockade upon the road towards Roncevalles. He may march to-morrow, but probably not till next day. Sir Thomas Picton likewise, with the ■■■ division, will march to Olagre, on the road to Lanz, and to Ugui as soon as he will be relieved in the blockade by the corps under General O'Donnell, which is ■■■ Puerta la Regua, three leagues from Pampeluna, and is ordered to take the blockade.

" The truth is, that having two objects in hand, viz. the siege of ■■■ Sebastian and the ■■■ of Pampeluna, ■■■ are not so strong ■■■ any point as we ought to be. These movements, when effected, will render us full strong enough for any thing.

"I shall not complete the movement upon Vera to-morrow, unless I should be able to see well, however necessary it may be to complete the siege of St. Sebastian, that I should have the command there. Considering how ticklish our affairs are to the right, I think you had better not yourself quit Elizondo; and endeavour to have an early communication with Campbell and Byng; and let I hear from you by Echelar. I shall be with the light division in the morning, but think that my quarters will be to-morrow at Sambilla, I perhaps here.

"I write to General Clinton at Lanz to desire him to endeavour to find a road to Ugui from Lanz on to Roncesvalles. I know that he can go to the former from Olagre.

"If you should find that Byng is attacked, order General Clinton to upon Roncesvalles by Ugui and Espinal.

"Ever yours most faithfully,

"WELLINGTON."

For time after the receipt of this letter, but few movements of importance made by the enemy within the observation of Sir Rowland, who remained at Elizondo. A portion of his troops in the mountains, where, for several days, no sounds reached their but the rush of falling waters and the of eagles, emblems of the fury and swiftness of the attacks which awaited them. On the 25th, Lingoen and at Maya, the enemy made tremendous onslaughts, disastrous to the allies and to the French themselves. On these occasions, Napier well observes, the stern valour of some of our troops would have graced Thermopylæ. The advantage gained by the Count D'Erlon cost him and a general. The loss inflicted on our ranks at Maya amounted to 1400 soldiers and four guns. Although the overwhelming force of the assailants obliged the defenders of the pass to fall back, Sir Rowland Hill recovered the key of the position in the pass before night-fall. General Byng attacked with prodigious impetuosity, and though he resisted with all the energy of his distinguished valour, he was unable to stand against the overpowering weight of numbers, and was forced up the mountain. His letter to Sir Rowland Hill, the following day, gives a most correct account of the affair: —

“ Dear Sir Rowland,

“ Lingon, July 26. 1813.

“ Enclosed with this I send you a copy of my report to Sir Lowry Cole, of what occurred yesterday. I cannot express the regret I feel in having been obliged to retire from the passes entrusted to my defence. I trust you will have the goodness to inquire into particulars from Sir Lowry Cole, and that inquiry will satisfy you that no blame attaches to myself or the troops I commanded; that for nine hours we maintained our position against five times a superior force to ourselves; that when we did retire, it was done in good order; that we had not a man taken prisoner, except those whose wounds were such that it would have endangered their lives if we had removed them — all that could be removed were brought away; and, lastly, we occasioned the enemy so great a loss, that he neither ventured an attack on our second position, nor to molest us in our retreat. These, Sir, I assure you, are facts which any inquiry will corroborate.

— Believe me,

“ Respectfully and truly yours,

— J. BYNG.

“ I really believe the force of the enemy opposed me was little short of 20,000 men, and that opposed to Sir Lowry Cole's division 12,000.

“ J. B.”

In his report to Sir Lowry Cole, General Byng said : — “ An officer who was prisoner to us, but who was too dangerously wounded to bring off, stated that the enemy had increased their force at St. Jean Pied de Port the preceding day by every possible means ; that he knew their force was full 22,000 men, and believed it to be more ; that Marshal Soult was expected there that morning, but uncertain if he was in the field ; that General Moncey commanded the troops to which I was opposed.” The General ere long made ample reprisals.

The only retrograde movement of Sir Rowland in consequence of these checks in the passes was his withdrawal on the 25th ; and we have seen that he recovered the important position before night. All the other movements made were dependent on those of the corps on his right flank, and were by order. They were not in any degree forced on him by the enemy in his immediate front. The withdrawal in consequence of the attacks was considered eminently skilful ; and Lord Wellington, in his despatch to Lord Bathurst, observed, “ I beg to draw your Lordship's attention to the valuable assistance I received throughout these operations from Lieutenant-General Sir Rowland Hill.”

On the 29th Soult, who had been foiled in his attempts against the allied position the two previous days, decided to try the relief of Pampeluna by an attack on Sir Rowland Hill, which was destined to turn the left of the allies. All these efforts were effectually repulsed, and severe losses were inflicted on the enemy. Sir Rowland took advantage of movement of Count D'Erlon to place his troops ■■■■ a mountain ridge, about ■ mile in ■■ rear, where he kept his ground the whole day with ■ coolness never surpassed. The French, thoroughly discomfited, ■■■■ compelled to retire in the night, and ■■■■ followed the next morning. In the pursuit the allies came in contact with two hostile divisions, in the pass of Donna Maria. They ■■■■ quickly dislodged by the joint ■■■■ of our General and Lord Dalhousie. General Byng, also, now triumphed ■■■■ his late opponents by capturing ■ large convoy in the town of Elizondo. On the first of August the pursuers followed the retreating French into the vale of the Bidassoa, and took many prisoners, ■ well as a great quantity of baggage. The evening of this day found the army posted on the frontier, in nearly the same positions ■ they occupied ■■ the 28th of July. Thus ended the often recounted conflicts of the Pyrenees.

Sir Rowland Hill immediately assured Lord Wellington that though not present at the action in the Maya pass, he ■■■■ “thoroughly satisfied that every exertion ■■■■ made for the defence of the post, and that it ■■■■ only abandoned when the superiority of the enemy's force would have rendered it impossible to have maintained it longer.” To General Stewart, who ■■■■ wounded ■■ the 25th in this pass, he wrote thus: —

“ My dear General,

— Arizin, August 4.

“ Having been much occupied during the last two days, ■■■■ plead my excuse for ■■■■ having written to you sooner, to thank you for your gallant exertions and zeal during our late operations, and to express my regret ■ being deprived of your services. I am, however, glad to find that your wounds are not of a dangerous nature, and request you will not again think of taking the field until you are perfectly recovered.

“ I am, &c.

“ R. HILL.”

“ Lieutenant-General Stewart.”

He also assured General Byng of his entire satisfaction, and that he should take the first opportunity of speaking to Lord Wellington of his gallantry in the mountains and of his valuable services in the battle of Vittoria. Nor ■■■ he forget his aide-de-camp, Captains Egerton and Churchill, on both of whom he passed, in recommending them for promotion, the most distinguished encomiums. The former he described as “ a very active and zealous officer of fifteen years' standing in the army — nine of them ■ Captain,” by whose promotion he should be particularly obliged. Thus he encouraged and endeavoured to reward all his gallant friends; but they ■■■ never admitted into that favoured circle unless the privilege ■■■ well deserved.

The British of all grades, as if inspired with the ■■■■ ■■ well as peril of their wild position ■■ the mountains, performed marvels of strength and daring in these contests. The chaplain of the 28th, the Rev. Charles Firth, during the conflict of Mays, actually carried three or four wounded officers down the rugged steps into the village, a distance of ■ mile and ■ half, at separate times, and gently deposited his gallant burdens where they ■■■ secure. The loss of the enemy ■■■ probably 15,000 men; — but may the rocks of these glorious mountains never again be tinged with blood, nor the vultures find their prey on the [REDACTED] of the brave! May peace reign throughout these scenes of nature's majesty, and the bold summits of the Pyrenees overshadow the rich vallies of the [REDACTED] tions they divide, without again having their echoes awakened by any sounds [REDACTED] those which call forth peaceful emotions, saddened, perchance, with the thought that they had ever responded to the dissonant cries and murderous thunders of war!

In the beginning of August, Lord Wellington deemed it expedient that Sir Rowland Hill should be on the extreme right of the army. He accordingly encamped near Roncesvalles; and towards the middle of the month, found leisure to tell his friends at home what difficulties he had encountered in the Pyrenees.

"Camp [REDACTED] Roncesvalles,

August 17. 1818.

" My dear Sister,

" Before this time, I imagine, the Prince of Orange will have reached England with the accounts of Soult's attempt [REDACTED] relieve Pampeluna, the action [REDACTED] that place, and the retreat of Soult again to the frontiers of France. During the whole of these operations you will observe that we had a good deal of fog and fighting; and although the small force I had with me [REDACTED] not, at all times, able to withstand the overwhelming numbers that [REDACTED] brought against us, yet I am [REDACTED] [REDACTED] contributed very essentially to the glorious result of the business. The fact is, Lord Wellington found it necessary to desire me to send from my corps to the main army, the divisions of [REDACTED] and the brigades of Generals Campbell and Byng, amounting to about 7000 men, leaving me with [REDACTED] more than [REDACTED] to occupy a very extensive [REDACTED] of country, which was liable to be attacked in any point by a superior force. In this situation the whole army of the centre, commanded by the Count D'Erlon, consisting of [REDACTED] least 17,000 men, attacked one of my posts, while Soult, with the main army, moved by this road towards Pampeluna. The public despatches will have given you details of all the events; and I shall merely add that, during the whole of the above-mentioned operations, the entire corps of the Count D'Erlon was employed against my 5000 men, which circumstance made a considerable diversion in favour of the battle of Pampeluna.

"We have again taken up a position on the frontiers of France, and I am on the right, having the whole of my corps with me. The country I have to defend is strong, but the position is very extensive. Soult must have lost a very considerable number of men during the last three weeks. I think it cannot be less than 15,000. One would imagine he cannot be in a state to act offensively, but he is still his resources, and it is possible he may make another effort to relieve Pampeluna and St. Sebastian. The former, I am told, may hold out till the beginning of October; the latter may be expected to fall sooner. The French officers talk very much of a general peace, which they wish very anxiously to wish for.

"Clement is quite well. Robert and Thomas, I believe, are also well. I have to thank you for your letters of the 7th of July, and remain

"Yours very affectionately,

"R. H."

The terms "fag and fighting," were evidently suggested by his gallant friend Sir Thomas Graham, who had written to him a few days before from the vicinity of San Sebastian.

"My dear Hill,

"Osarzan, August 12. 1813.

"I profit by Dr. Ferguson's passing here in his way to the second division to send you two lines. You have had a great deal of fag and fighting of late, which I was glad to hear you had escaped safe from. We are waiting for ordnance ships to bring ammunition and more guns to enable us to renew the attack against St. Sebastian, which we tried to ~~break in~~ successfully on the 25th ult. But the defences were untouched, and the enemy made too good ~~use~~ of them against our column of attack, confined to a very narrow front between the river and the foot of the left line wall, where it was left dry by the falling of the tide. Adieu.

"I hope you received the box sent by Lieutenant-Col. Colburn of the ~~1st~~ ~~regt~~ safe, with the coffee essence from Lord Mulgrave, in the top of which I sent ~~an~~ old map of yours which has been travelling about with ~~me~~ for years, in order to be returned.

"Ever faithfully yours,

"THO. GRAHAM.

"Remember ~~me~~ to Currie. ~~I~~ have been suffering again a good deal from my eye and stomach."

Sir Noel Hill ~~was~~ engaged in the siege of San Sebastian, and was by no means delighted with his post. "We are still," he said, "detained here by this abominable place; but as another battering train is arrived from England, the siege will now be carried ~~on~~ with some prospect of success." When the town did fall at last, he ~~was~~ reported for distinguished services.

Soult, after his repulse, had resumed his former position, and the work of fortifying it ~~was~~ carried on with much assiduity. During September and October Sir Rowland occupied the camp ~~at~~ Roncesvalles, and kept up a constant observation of the proceedings of the hostile army. Every clear day he ~~was~~ actively ~~employed~~ employed with a glass in endeavouring to make out their plans and intentions; ~~but~~ was he less attentive to his ~~own~~ defences. On October the 8th, Lord Wellington attacked the enemy's right, ~~with~~ with the view of obliging them to go a little farther back on that side." Pampeluna still held out; but Sir Rowland was persuaded that it could not stand much longer. O'Donnell, Conde de l'Abispal, who had been stationed at that place, and co-operated with him during the battles of the Pyrenees, was gone; but his Andalusians and Don Carlos D'España had blockaded the place till the middle of September; — still it was not till October that the surrender was made, under pressure of intolerable disease and misery. The Conde was always looking out for every opportunity of distinction. On one occasion in the Pyrenees, when Sir Rowland had obtained an advantage, O'Donnell became exceedingly angry at not having been called out into a more effective position, and considered himself deprived of the glory he should certainly have acquired. "O'Donnell is in such a rage," said Sir Rowland quietly to Lord Wellington. "Never mind, I'll find plenty for him to do another day," was his Lordship's reply. The day came; he was put forward with his troops in a ravine; the French enfiladed them; O'Donnell did not flinch, but was angry. "From that day," Lord Hill used to say, "I never saw him or heard from him."

About the middle of October, it was suggested from home that Sir Rowland should go and take the command of the armies of Catalonia. With regard to this proposition he remarked, "Lord Wellington expressed a wish to the contrary; consequently I remain here, which I am glad of." At the end of the month he thus described his situation to Sir George Murray:—

" My dear General, " Roncesvalles, Oct. 29, 10 A. M.

" We have had a great fall of snow yesterday and this day, and from what I have heard this morning, I fear it will be impossible to keep our troops on the height, at least, while the snow continues to fall, for it drifts to such a degree as to endanger their being buried. Indeed I understand that three men are missing this morning. I send this in the hope of its being able to reach you, which I think by ■ means certain. I have desired General Pringle to report to you also the state of the country in his neighbourhood. I expect General Byng down from the mountains; I shall then be able to judge what is best to be done.

" I have, &c.

" R. HILL.

" Sir Geo. Murray,
" to be read by Gen. Pringle."

To a friend he also wrote, " Dreadful weather for the troops on the mountains; snow, rain, and such tremendous winds that no tents can be used."

Lord Wellington proposed shortly after this time to confer with him, and desired both Marshal Beresford and Sir George Murray to inform him of this intention, and to appoint the spot where they should meet. His ■■■■■ to the latter shows the difficulties he had to contend with:—

" Roncesvalles, Nov. 5. 1813. (Noon.)

" My dear General,

" I have received your letter of yesterday in duplicate. The road from hence to Aldudes is still bad, but I believe there is no doubt ■ to ■ practicability for the troops and baggage and commissariat. Our movements will therefore commence to-morrow as directed. I have ■ doubt we shall be collected in the valley of Maya on the day following. I go myself to Elizondo to-morrow, and will meet Lord Wellington ■ noon ■ the 7th, at the place pointed out, 'Colonel Browne's quarters in front of Urdax.' In a letter I wrote to you ■ few days ago, I mentioned that we had buried three of Captain Maxwell's guns ■ the mountains, owing to ■ impossibility of withdrawing them on account of the snow. I am happy to say that we have, by the great exertions of the artillery and troops, been able to extricate them.

"I have, &c.

"R. HILL.

"Sir George Murray."

Lord Wellington ■ ■ ■ preparing for the battle of the Nivelle, where Sir Rowland established ■ ■ ■ claims upon the gratitude of his country. The narrative of this important event will make ■ appropriate opening for the next chapter.

CHAPTER X.

BOWLAND'S POSITION. — AN ATTACK ON HIM. — WELLINGTON. — BATTLE OF THE NIVE. — COMPLIMENT OF WELLINGTON. — CLEMENT'S NEWS. — NEWS ON THE ADOUR. — INTIMACY BETWEEN THE FRENCH AND ENGLISH SOLDIERS. — PATTEN'S "PAWN." — BOWLAND'S CONDUCT. — STRATAGEMS OF THE ENEMY. — NEW ARRANGEMENTS OF THE ARMY. — WELLINGTON'S SUCCESS EFFECTUALLY CONCEALED. — SUCCESS OF BOWLAND. — ORTHEZ. — LORD WELLINGTON RECONNOITRES. — BATTLE OF ORTHEZ. — BATTLE OF AIRE. — DEATH OF COLONEL HILL. — BATTLE OF TARBES. — ARRANGEMENTS FOR PASSING THE GARONNE. — SIEGE OF TOULOUSE. — BATTLE OF MONTMIRAIL. — DEATH OF COLONEL COOK. — ABDICATION OF BONAPARTE. — SIR [REDACTED] A PEER.

THE French spared no pains in fortifying their position. In front of St. Jean de Luz their right rested on the sea, and their line covered the town, stretching from the shore twelve miles inland, crossing the Nivelle, and ending behind the village of Ainhoue. The approach to their left was protected by works on a mountain fronting that village, and their centre on the left of the river, which takes a sinuous course northwards. The bridges above and below Ascain were strongly defended, as was the space enclosed by the banks of the river. On a range of elevated ground behind Sarre was the grand defence of the centre, strengthened by two redoubts, and by a mountain called La Petite la Rhune, which had been retrenched. Nature and art combined to afford security to the enemy, but Lord Wellington had in defiance of both to force their centre and turn their right. Before 10 o'clock on the morning of the 10th of November, the allies descended from the mountains by moonlight. Sir Rowland Hill commanded the right wing, which emerged from the rocky passes, and arrived within reach of the French about 11 o'clock. While victory was being achieved by other gallant officers, Sir Rowland moved against the heights of Ainhoë and cleared the nearest redoubt. He afterwards led two divisions at Espelette, forced the enemy from the works in front of Ainhoë, and obliged them to retreat. The combined efforts of the allies at length established them in the rear of the enemy's right, and ere sunset terminated the dread fight of the Nivelle. Soult completely manœuvred out of the designs of his long labours. Though his numbers were seventy thousand, and he had every advantage that mountains, whose intricacies well known to him, could afford, fifty guns and fifteen hundred prisoners were taken from him as the spoils of the day.

Four days after the battle of the Nivelle, Sir Rowland was at St. Pé. He sent a hurried letter home, which he wrote while Lord Worcester and Lord Fitzroy Somerset were in the field. "I do not see," he said, "any prospect of our having another fight. The glorious news from the North, I trust, will ere long settle Napoleon. The people in France receive it well. I was met with so much attention. The mayor of Ustaritz prepared an excellent dinner for me yesterday; and the people [redacted] out of their houses to give our people wine." On the 27th of November, he observed, in writing to his brother, — "Our future operations, I imagine, will depend a good deal upon what is going [redacted] in other quarters. We [redacted] perfectly prepared [redacted] on the offensive; and if the allies on the Rhine continue to do so, we shall not be idle. On the other hand, if Bonaparte is not kept well occupied either by internal commotions, or by [redacted] northern friends, perhaps it may be well for [redacted] to maintain [redacted] safe and threatening position. This latter situation we have at present. At the [redacted] time, we are very much cramped; and although we may be able to get our men under cover, the total want of forage for the animals is [redacted] serious inconvenience. If you look at the map you will see [redacted] present position. My right is on the mountains to the right of this place; my left at Cambo. Marshal Beresford is at Ustaritz and down the Nive to within about [redacted] league of Bayonne, from which point, to the sea, Sir John Hope has his corps. The rains which fell about [redacted] fortnight ago rendered the river Nive a formidable barrier: the last week's fine weather has, however, made the river fordable in many parts, in consequence of which both parties [redacted] kept on the alert. The enemy, notwithstanding, has much [redacted] to fear than [redacted] have. The inhabitants, certainly, [redacted] not unfriendly to us; and many [redacted] daily returning to their homes, finding they [redacted] well treated by the British and Portuguese. The main body of our cavalry is kept in the rear [redacted] present."

About the period of this letter, [redacted] correspondence passed between Lord Wellington and Sir Rowland Hill relative to the passage of the Nive, and considerable discretionary power placed by his Lordship in his hands. The second week in December, Marshal Beresford apprised him that it considered probable an attack would be made upon him.

“ My dear Hill,                      “ Arouritz, 11th Dec. 1813, 7 A. M.

“ I have here, by my way to the outposts, received a letter from Lord Wellington. He says the enemy made progress yesterday beyond driving in the outposts and pickets, and he does not think he will resist the attack. The prisoners in general say that only one division (of Paris) retired towards St. Jean de Pied de Port; another prisoner said two divisions. It appears that the rest of this army came through Bayonne for the attack yesterday. Lord W. says you must not be surprised if he should resist his attack against you, in which case the one division, now at Ustaritz, will pass over to your support; and, in all events, if you want it send for it, and Sir W. Clinton has directions to conform to your wishes. Lord W. says the enemy yesterday brought from your side three, some say four, divisions; and it is not quite certain if one division was not left in their entrenched camp on your side.

“ Yours most sincerely,

“ W. C. BERRSFORD.

“ Lt.-General Sir Rowland Hill.”

The expected attack was made on the 13th; and the same day, “ at noon,” Lord Wellington had the satisfaction of writing to Sir John Hope, “ I have the pleasure to inform you that Hill has beat them completely;” and also to Sir J. Kennedy, “ Sir R. Hill has given the enemy a terrible beating.” To General Castanos he wrote, “ Vous serez bien-aise de savoir que le Général Hill battit l'ennemi terriblement avanthier. Il y a long temps que je n'ai pas tant de morts sur le champ de bataille. J'ai droite sur l'Adour, de laquelle la communication est coupée pour l'ennemi."

This great service thus performed by Sir Rowland. The enemy, who had failed in all their attempts with their whole force upon Lord Wellington's left, withdrew to their entrenchments on the night of December 12th, and passed a large body of troops through the town of Bayonne. With these, on the morning of the 13th, they made a desperate attack on Sir Rowland Hill. This, as has appeared, was not unexpected; and Lord Wellington had placed at his disposal not only the sixth division, but the fourth division, and two brigades of the third. Soult's objects were to gain the bridge of St. Pierre, to make himself master of the road to St. Jean Pied de Port, and to break through the position of the allies. For these purposes he put forth his whole strength, and was completely vanquished. Even before the sixth division arrived, Sir Rowland had repulsed him with prodigious loss; and although he skilfully availed himself of a high ground in retreating, he could not stand against the famous charge of General Byng, and was entirely defeated. It was a battle fought and won by the corps of Sir Rowland Hill alone and unaided. At the instant of victory Lord Wellington sprang up, and in the ecstasy of the moment of triumph caught him by the hand and said, "Hill, the day is your own." Such were his feelings at the battle of the Nive. His gallant brother, Major Clement Hill, was again sent to England with the news. It was incorrectly reported that he had returned to Passages from stress of weather, which is alluded to in Sir Rowland's next letter.

“ Vieux Manguerre, Dec. 31. 1813, ■ ■ ■

— My dear Clement,

“ By this time I hope you have reached London in safety. You ■■■ have ■■■ tremendous weather about the 20th. It was a great satisfaction to us to hear of your getting back to Passages. Soult ■■■ not shown any disposition to disturb ■■■ in this quarter; he has moved about six divisions out of the town of Bayonne, placing two opposite to Urt, the others further up the Adour, and on this side towards St. Palais. With respect to our future operations, nothing, as far as I know, is yet determined upon, though we are looking for the best communications for our pontoons towards the Adour. I enclose you ■ letter from Egerton, who ■■ doubt sends you all the family anecdotes and events. Should it appear that the year 1814 is likely to turn out another year of campaigning in this country for us, I think you will do well to bring out ■■■ canteen dishes, &c., a complete set of saddlery for two ■■ three horses, with cloths, rollers, &c., and any thing else you know will be acceptable.

“ Jan. 1, ■ P. M.

“ It was my intention to have finished this letter this morning, but I have been prevented in consequence of a little expedition ■■ my part to the island opposite to Urt, with the view of preventing the enemy from constructing works upon it.”

Lord Wellington at the beginning of the new year disposed his forces so as to be in readiness ■■ any emergency; and Sir Rowland Hill was busily engaged in adopting ■■■■■ to prevent the enemy's boats from navigating the Adour. Finding musketry ineffectual, he proposed to try rockets, which he thought would, ■■ least, confuse the boatmen; but

Lord Wellington considered that the French found them almost harmless, they would after the first alarm cease to regard them. At length he sent for some heavy guns. In a note to General Fane respecting them, he mentioned the detriment to the service which resulted out of the intimacy of the French and his own soldiers. "You did," he said, "perfectly right in receiving the flag of truce addressed to me. The intercourse, however, going on between our soldiers and the French has increased to such an extent, that I have been under the necessity of giving out another order upon the subject." The fact was the officers had become quite intimate with each other, and the men carried on a regular traffic upon a rivulet running between the two armies. A great stone was placed in the stream, and on it a canteen was put containing money. After a time this was found filled with brandy. One evening the French sentry failed to supply the brandy to a man named Patten, who was, as he supposed, tricked out of his liquor. He dashed across the stream in the morning, seized the French sentry, stripped him, and carried his accoutrements in triumph to the picket house. A flag of truce soon afterwards appeared, and the French captain who came with it begged hard for the return of the things taken from the sentry, on the ground that if they were retained, his own commission and the sentry's life would be undoubtedly forfeited. "I have got them in pawn," said Patten, "for a canteen of brandy;" but he gave them up, and refused to accept money offered him by the officer. Still, poor Patten was sentenced to receive 300 lashes. Sir Rowland had the delinquent led out with great parade as if to undergo this punishment, and addressed a remonstrance to all the regiments on the indiscretion and probable consequences of such conduct. But, at length, he unexpectedly enumerated many acts of gallantry performed by the prisoner, and, in the midst of faces beaming with admiration, remitted the sentence.

The enemy's boats still persisted in navigating the Adour. Sir George Murray consequently directed by Lord Wellington to desire Sir Rowland to fire red-hot shot against them, both from the heavy guns and the four-pounders. Sir George likewise said "it might be expedient to fire a number of these shot down the river, in situations where the enemy may be made aware of our using them, as their knowledge of our doing so may be an additional means of deterring their boatmen from the service." He also stated:—"Lieutenant-Colonel Dickenson will be directed to send you a number of rockets that you may make use of them whenever circumstances appear favourable." These precautions enabled Sir Rowland on the 21st to report—"I do not believe that any boats have passed Urt since the night of the 16th, when, as Colonel Jackson will have informed you, three went down the Adour. General Fane has fitted out two boats, and has selected for each ten or twelve from General Barnes's brigade, and given charge of each of them to Lieutenant Law, of the 71st, who was formerly in the navy. He is an active intelligent officer; and I am inclined to think that if any of the enemy's boats attempt to pass, he is very likely to get hold of them. The Portuguese officer on picket duty yesterday reports, that in the evening about 3000 [REDACTED] passed over the bridge of Bayonne from the town to the right bank of the river." All the reports at this time were of [REDACTED] exciting nature. On the 25th, [REDACTED] P.M., General Fane reported — "It [REDACTED] the opinion of the people about here that something is intended against our posts to-morrow. It is said that [REDACTED] number of conscripts have joined, and that biscuit and spirits were to-day given to the troops." On the 26th, General Byng reported — "Two regiments marched into Bayonne between twelve and one last night. In the night a large boat made [REDACTED] attempt to get up the river which our picket [REDACTED] able to prevent, and she now lies opposite. Two smaller boats did pass." On hearing this, Sir Rowland took instant measures, and [REDACTED] more boats appeared; but the French retaliated by attacking his pickets [REDACTED] Urt. The object of Soult seemed to be to throw the allies [REDACTED] the defensive. He also sounded Morillo [REDACTED] the possibility of gaining over the Spaniards. Morillo sent Sir Rowland some curious documents [REDACTED] this subject, including [REDACTED] letter from General Paris stating that he had orders not to attack the Spanish troops. These papers [REDACTED] immediately forwarded to head-quarters.

In February the weather was such [REDACTED] to enable Lord Wellington to [REDACTED] [REDACTED] series of manœuvres, to draw Soult from his line of defence [REDACTED] the Adour, and important instructions, too technical for insertion here, [REDACTED] sent to Sir Rowland Hill. It was in [REDACTED] sequence of these that he was enabled to tell his friends that he [REDACTED] again in motion.

“ [REDACTED] Bedford's House, Ustaritz, [REDACTED] 12. 1814.

“ My dear Sister,

“ I have the satisfaction to inform you that we are again in motion, with every fair prospect of [REDACTED]. The weather has improved, and the state of our commissariat is such that I hope we have nothing to fear with regard to our supplies. It appears that my troops [REDACTED] the operations, for which purpose [REDACTED] are this day collecting in the neighbourhood of Hasparren, with the view of moving towards Pau. In addition to my troops I shall have Sir Thomas Picton's division with me. The enemy have [REDACTED] force in my front, but I do not expect any serious resistance. I trust you will receive good accounts of our proceedings.

“ I have received your letter of the 21st of last month, and the Shrewsbury papers up to that period. I perfectly agree with you that the Salopians not only deserve my grateful thanks for the [REDACTED] in which they are manifesting their regard towards me, but I feel I never [REDACTED] expressions sufficiently strong to convey my [REDACTED] of their kindness [REDACTED] the occasion.

• • • • •

“ With respect to the handsome present of beef, I am sorry [REDACTED] say it has not yet reached Passages. Immediately on my receiving your letter [REDACTED] the subject, I [REDACTED] Robert Sharp to inquire about it. He is returned without it. I do, however, hope the next packet will bring this present.

“ It [REDACTED] the French princes at St. Jean de Luz have been waited upon in a private manner by many respectable people, and have received [REDACTED] of support when [REDACTED] arrive. This [REDACTED] indeed a [REDACTED] interesting time, and [REDACTED] few weeks will in [REDACTED] likelihood produce great events. God grant they may be for the best.

“ Yours most affectionately.”

Sir Rowland marched with the right of the army on the 14th. He soon came upon the French pickets ■ the Joyense river, ■ drove them in. He then advanced against Harispe, whom he obliged to retreat, with ■ loss, towards St. Martin. The next day he pursued the enemy in the direction of Garis, where Harispe had been joined by Paris, and by troops from the centre. Towards sunset, after ■ fatiguing march, the soldiers of his division were excited by the sounds of skirmishing, which made "the ■ ■ fresh ■ when they started." They proceeded from the Spaniards under Morillo, who were assailing the outposts of ■ strong French position on ■ height. It ■ nearly dusk when Sir Rowland arrived at the foot of the hill, but he gave instant orders for an attack. Sir William Stewart led the gallant second division up the steep, dislodged the enemy, and dispersed them in all directions, though they fought most valiantly. In the night they passed ■ the river at St. Palais, destroying the bridges. These, however, were speedily repaired, so that Sir Rowland crossed on the 16th. The day following the French were driven ■ the Gave de Mauleon, and meant to destroy the bridge ■ Arriverete, but were prevented. In the night the fugitives retired across the Gave d'Oleron, and proceeded to Sauveterre, where they were joined by other troops. On the 18th the allies ■ established ■ the Gave d'Oleron, where Sir Rowland had to await the arrival of the pontoon train before he could cross the river. These operations with the right of the army, entirely concealed from Soult the design of Lord Wellington to cross the Adour below Bayonne with his left.

Sir Rowland was waiting for the pontoons, the French took possession of a building called the "Red House." Lord Wellington refers to it in the following letter:—

"My dear Hill,

"Garin, A.M. Feb. 19. 1814.

"Churchill has just left me. If you can retake the Red House in the manner you took it yesterday morning it is desirable to have it; but I should think the enemy would have covered themselves during the night from the effect of the fire of your artillery, and it will not be very easy then to dislodge them, or to prevent them from working a tête de pont, as it is most probable that their guns in the wood would be under the fire of theirs from the right bank of the river.

"If you cannot take the Red House you had better hold the village of Arriverete, as a tête de pont; the village on the right of the same river where the Barca was, in the same manner, in order to secure the passages, and St. Gloire, Barrante, &c. as advanced posts from them.

"Your position, in this case, would be on the heights on the left of the Gave de Mauleon, and it is a very good one.

"Morillo would occupy the upper fords and bridges in the same manner.

"I think you had better leave the third division where they are; those at St. Palais cover you from any movement by Mauleon, and the others you left; however, you will move them if you think proper.

"I mention all this in case the enemy should undertake any enterprise against you, which is not very probable.

"Ever yours most sincerely,

"WELLINGTON.

"Lieut.-General Sir Rowland Hill, K.B.

"In the position above mentioned, concealing your troops, and not making any movement of large bodies in sight of the enemy, you will be able to reconnoitre all the passages of the river within your reach."

In the midst of these engagements Sir Rowland wrote briefly to his sister:—

“ My dear Sister, “ St. Palais, 1814.

“ I feel thankful for the further success which my troops in our operations during the last week.

Lord Wellington was witness on these occasions to our proceedings, and, I have no doubt, am perfectly satisfied with the conduct of all. This is the first day that I have been down in a house for the last week, and I have not many minutes to write, but I cannot resist sending you a line to tell you that I am well. I do not see any immediate prospect of my being engaged with the enemy; indeed I am in hourly expectation of hearing of peace, as it appears that the Congress has been sitting for several days, and it also appears that the ministers assembled at it are on good terms. This is a fine country, and the inhabitants extremely civil. Kind remembrance to John and all at home.

“ Yours very affectionately.”

On the 24th the Gave d'Oleron crossed at Villeneuve, and the enemy evacuated Sauveterre, retiring upon Orthez. They were speedily followed, and the Gave de Pau passed in the evening of the 26th without opposition, though the whole French army was in front of Orthez. On the 27th day Sir Rowland was thus instructed:—

“ Sauveterre, 1814.

“ My dear Sir Rowland,

“ I conclude the detachment of pontoons ordered to join you will have arrived to-night. If so, Lord Wellington wishes you to endeavour to establish a bridge near Orthez, as early as you can in the morning. I beg you will send a report to the left in the morning of the appearance of things in your front. I expect we shall hear from you that the enemy have retreated.

“ Believe me faithfully yours,

“ G. MURRAY, Q. M. G.

“ If we get into Orthez every exertion should be made to repair the bridge, that our pontoons may become again disposable for other service for which they will be immediately wanted. “ G. M.”

The troops of Sir Rowland Hill occupied the heights opposite Orthez and the road leading to Sauveterre. On the 27th, after the sixth and light divisions had crossed the river they found the French in strength, and determined to oppose the passage of Sir Rowland. Lord Wellington himself reconnoitred the enemy's disposition for battle. He took his survey from a spot once the site of a Roman encampment; and without the slightest disturbance of the calm intelligence of his clear and piercing eye, beheld the two divisions which had crossed coming up from the river. They were impeded by the rocks, and the point of junction with the third division, to which they tended, was in dangerous proximity to the French. When that point was reached, he connected his wings, formed a central reserve, and deliberately arranged his plans. Though even Picton was agitated, Wellington was apparently unmoved. Finding, however, that unexpected difficulties arose, and that at that moment seemed to declare in favour of the enemy, he suddenly changed his method of attack. He successfully availed himself of a pass behind the village of St. Boes, hitherto deemed impracticable, got through his infantry, cavalry, and artillery, spread his front on the other side, and secured a victory. Two thirds only of the army had been engaged. Sir Rowland, with twelve thousand men, was before the bridge of Orthez, and at the critical instant of Lord Wellington's change of plan was ordered to force the passage of the Gave. This he effected above Orthez, and made ■ subsequent movement of a nature so threatening, that it determined the retreat of Soult. "This retreat, first made in order, became," said Lord Wellington, "at last ■ flight, and the troops were in the utmost confusion." The ■■ results of these victorious operations were the investment of Bayonne, St. Jean Pied de Port, and Navarrens, and the long-desired passage of the Adour. The names of Beresford, Hill, Hope, and Cotton were thus mentioned in Lord Wellington's despatch:— "It is impossible for ■■ sufficiently to express my sense of their merits, or of the degree in which the country is indebted to their zeal and abilities for the situation in which the army now finds itself."

After ■ very short interval, Lord Wellington had to acknowledge another important service on the part of Sir Rowland Hill. A corps of the enemy was collected ■■ Aire, "probably with ■ view to protect the evacuation of ■ magazine they had at that place." In this direction he advanced on the 2d of March. The French occupied ■ strong ridge of hills with their right flank ■■ the Adour, thus covering the road to the town. It ■■ about two o'clock when Sir Rowland approached, and gave immediate orders for ■■ attack. Sir William Stewart, with the second division, assaulted and gained possession of the enemy's extreme right, while General La Costa moved up the heights against their centre; but his Portuguese troops ■■ repulsed. Sir William Stewart promptly repaired the ill effects of this disaster, by sending a strong force under General Barnes to the assistance of the Portuguese, and they made such a charge on the French ■ threw them into utter confusion. Still they rallied again. But General Byng came up with ■ brigade, and Harispe and Villette, the French generals, were completely driven off, the former towards the river Luz, the latter through Aire into the space formed by two branches of the stream. They suffered a great loss in ■ and wounded, besides ■ than 100 prisoners. The troops that fled in the direction of Pau threw away their arms. It ■ in all respects a signal victory; "affording," to ■ the words of Lord Wellington, "another instance of the conduct and gallantry of the troops under" Sir Rowland's command.

In the midst of these successes he ■ yet a mourner. Coincident with this victory was the announcement from home of the death of his eldest brother, Colonel Hill, beloved by his relatives, the favourite of all the county to which he belonged, courteous, mild, benevolent, dignified, and the father of a young and promising family. It ■ from Aire, the ■ of his victory, and on the very day when he ■ obliged to write his official despatch, that he thus addressed his sister on this painful topic: —

"My dear Sister,

"Aire, ■ March, 1814.

"No event ever occurred to me that shocked me so much as the receipt of your second letter, on the subject of the decease of our dear brother. ■ do not know which of us has most reason to regret the sad event. He was beloved by all of us. His amiable wife is greatly to be pitied. ■■ kindness to our family can never be forgotten, and it will be my most anxious wish, ■■■ as my duty, to do all in my power towards her. If I had ever so much time I could not express my real feelings on this melancholy occasion, but under present circumstances ■ am sure you will ■ expect me to say much. I am only this moment come into this town, and I understand Lord Wellington will send his despatches off early to-morrow morning. You will see that in the midst of my affliction, I have had to attend to important military matters. Scarcely ■ day has passed without our being in the presence and in contact with the enemy: all our operations have been attended with success, and the enemy are ■■ retreating towards Toulouse. Surely Bonaparte ■■ not hold out much longer. If I have time, I will, in the ■■■ of the day, write to you again, but in case I should not, I send this off. I must, however, beg to be kindly remembered to Sir John and Mrs. Hill, and do most sincerely condole with all ■ home on the late afflicting event which has taken place at Hawkstone.

“ Yours, my dear Sister, most affectionately.

“ Two mails missing!”

Major Clement Hill, who had arrived at Hawkstone, reported to Sir Rowland the resignation with which his family submitted to their loss. To this he adverted in ■ letter addressed to ■■ of the ■■■■:—

“ Gassin, four leagues from Pau, ■■■■ 18. 1814.

“ I have received Clement's letter of the 12th February, by which I am truly happy to hear so good an account of all my friends ■ Hawkstone, after the melancholy event which has taken place there. Indeed, the more I think of it, the ■■■ I lament it. We all, however, must expect death, and ought to keep prepared for it.

* * * * *

“ I imagine Major Fremantle has reached London by this time with accounts of our operations up to the ■ of this month, on which day you will see I had a little affair of my own, and which, owing to the bad conduct of some Portuguese, was the most critical I had ever to do with. The gallant conduct, however, of a few British soon put matters to rights, and the result was most fortunate for us.

"Soul's army is about four or five leagues from hence, and our main force is halting while Marshal Beresford is marching with two divisions to Bourdeaux, where it is supposed he will be well received by the people. It is a cruel situation for the people. I am sure they would be glad to get rid of Bonaparte, and wish well to Louis, but given to understand that the allies are treating for peace with Bonaparte; consequently it would be madness in them, and cruel in us to expect them to hoist the white cockade at this moment."

On the 18th, by break of day, the whole army was in motion, and Sir Rowland's corps formed the right, marching from Garlin upon Conchez. Sir Rowland, after a severe skirmish, drove back the French outposts upon Lambèze; then came the combat of Vic Bigorre, and on the 20th the battle of Tarbes. To the last-named place the enemy retired in the night, and in the morning were driven by the allies with the advanced posts of their left in the town, and their right upon the heights, near a neighbouring windmill. Their centre and left retired; the latter in an elevated situation. On Sir Rowland devolved the attack on Tarbes, which was made by the high road from Vic Bigorre. He moved through the town, and the French fled in all directions with considerable loss. Sir Henry Clinton drove them through the village of Dours, and Baron Alten from the heights above Orleix. In the evening Soult retired by St. Gaudens to Toulouse, the hills blazing with fires for guidance.

On the 21st Sir Rowland's directions were, " Lord Wellington desires that you will be so good as to put the troops under your immediate orders in motion to-morrow morning, and advance by the great road ■■■■ far ■■■■ Monrejeau, rendering ■■■■ part of your cavalry ■■■■ forward, and pushing your patrols ■■■■ far ■■■■ you can upon the Toulouse road by St. Gaudens. It ■■■■ desirable to keep up the appearance of the enemy being followed by the army in that direction." On the 22d the instructions were, " The left and centre of the army ■■■■ to be thrown in the direction of the great road which leads from Auch to Toulouse, pointing in that direction either upon l'Isle en Jourdain or upon Gimont. We shall therefore be in ■■■■ sort of echelon, of which the left will be towards one ■■■■ other of the places above named (l'Isle en Jourdain or Gimont), and the right upon the great road by St. Gaudens to Toulouse. It is probable that ■■■■ the left and centre move on, the left of your corps will be directed to conform to their movement; but it will be necessary that part of your right should be always in ■■■■ situation to keep ■■■■ force upon the great road by St. Gaudens to Toulouse." At length the pontoons arrived, and the following plan ■■■■ drawn out: —

" Portet, March 27. 1814, 3 ■■■■

■ ■■ ■ Arrangement for the Passage of the Garonne.

" Sir R. Hill will be so good as to cause the pontoon-bridge to be thrown across the river ■■■■ Portet this night. He will commence passing the troops under his immediate command, beginning with the infantry, as soon as the bridge is laid. The troops of the centre and left of the army will ■■■■ moved ■■■■ day-break towards Portet, and will ■■■■ the river after the right column has crossed. Sir Rowland Hill will establish himself in strength as soon as possible upon the heights on the right bank of the Garonne, forming a front towards Toulouse and towards the great road which runs from Toulouse by Castanet towards Castelnadaury.

“The position of the army will be further extended in proportion as more troops pass over.

“Sir R. Hill will be so good as to establish as direct a communication as he can with head-quarters this afternoon, and apprise the Quarter-Master-General of the line of communication established. Sir Rowland will be so good as to order reports to be sent to head-quarters of the progress made in the establishment of the bridge, as also when the troops begin to pass. A communication is also to be established with Plaisance.”

The passage of the Garonne was found impracticable, and Sir Rowland's troops were withdrawn to St. Roques. In the night of the 30th a new bridge was laid near Pensaguel, and he passed with two divisions of infantry. He used sometimes in conversation to mention the great trouble these bridges cost him. “For instance,” he would say, “at a point where all seemed most promising, I found we had not enough to pass by exactly one boat, and we had all our work to do again at a different place.” I shall never forget the coolness with which he mentioned this provoking circumstance; and a person present remarked, that he could not doubt just how cool when it happened.

By the 3d of April he had advanced to Toulouse, and his officers occupied the beautiful villas of the suburbs. On the 3d Lord Wellington thought Sir Rowland would probably be attacked the next day, and instructed him, if there seemed to be any risk in attempting to maintain the position opposite Toulouse, to fall back behind the Touch river. If he deemed it expedient to retire still farther, he was to do so by the Auch road behind the rivulet between Colomiers and Lequemin. In the enemy's force moved to his right to oppose the passage of the river, Lord Wellington wished him to make a show of attacking the suburb, and to be informed of it, that he might know the of the firing. No movement, however, took place, and a corps was thrown over the right of the Garonne on the 4th. At 10 P. M. on the 9th, Sir Rowland informed, "It is intended to move against the enemy's position on this side of the river, to-morrow morning after day-break. Lord Wellington wishes therefore that you should make such arrangements, threatening the suburb of Toulouse on the left bank of the river, circumstances admit of, in order to draw a part of the attention and force of the enemy to that side. You will be able to the commencement and progress of the operations on this side, and you will be good enough to regulate yours accordingly." The next morning, Easter Sunday, came the battle of Toulouse. While the other operations of Lord Wellington proceeding, Sir Rowland performed the task allotted to him with his usual vigour and success. He drove the French within the ancient wall, from their exterior works in the suburb on the left of the Garonne. It was a desecration of the Sabbath in every way to be lamented; for Napoleon had previously abdicated his throne.

On the 12th Lord Wellington entered Toulouse, and Sir Rowland was directed to march through the town and to continue his march along the Carcassonne road. It was a moment of anxiety. "It is impossible," was Lord Wellington's message to him, "to say until Colonel Cook's return, whether we are to be at peace with Marshal Soult." In the mean time he was desired to make his cavalry keep sight of the enemy, but not to engage his infantry unless the cavalry required support. The arrival of Colonel Cook was joyfully announced by Sir Rowland to his family.

"Toulouse, April 13. 1814.

"I do most sincerely congratulate you and all my friends upon the glorious event which has just been made known to us. Colonel Cook arrived this morning from Paris with the account of the abdication of Bonaparte. The Colonel is gone in to Marshal Soult, and I have no doubt an immediate cessation of hostilities will take place, though at this moment there is a little firing at the outposts. Should it be settled so there is every reason to suppose they will, I may hope ere long to have the happiness of seeing you all. It is indeed most gratifying to me that we have got rid of Bonaparte; the more so as, only a few days ago, we had every reason to think that a peace would be made with him! The papers will give you an account of our late operations. You will see that my troops were not much fighting in the battle near Toulouse, though we had our share of fatigue and anxiety during the period we were about that place. The joy and enthusiasm of the people of Toulouse when we entered, was, to all appearance, more sincere than any thing of the kind I ever witnessed. Robert is in Toulouse: I have not yet seen him. I have this instant a message from our outposts to inform me a flag of truce is there;

■ doubt upon the subject of Colonel Cook's mission. I will ■ you know the result to-morrow, but send this off in case Lord Wellington's despatches should go off this evening.

"Yours, my dear Sister,

"Very affectionately."

Soult, upon the receipt of the important information from Paris, proposed ■ armistice, to gain time for further tidings, to which Lord Wellington declined to accede. On the 16th it was officially stated to Sir Rowland, — "It is Lord Wellington's intention that no unnecessary or partial hostilities should take place previously to the army being closed up. His Lordship will then ■ whether it is necessary to press Marshal Soult further." Two days afterwards they heard as follows: —

"Toulouse, 18th April, 1814.

"My dear Sir Rowland,

"The terms of ■ armistice have been agreed upon, and as ■ ■ Marshal Soult has signified his ■ to them the business will be completed. The armistice includes the allied troops in Catalonia and those under Marshal Suchet, ■ well as the armies in this quarter, and the fortresses and the troops before them. The army will therefore not make any movement to-day, and head-quarters will be ■ Toulouse. It is probable that the greater part of the troops will be drawn further back to-morrow, to be cantoned ■ encamped in more convenient situations.

"■ beg you will be so good as to let the contents of this letter be communicated to Sir Lowry Cole, and also to the other general officers, whose troops ■ in communication with those under your own immediate command.

"Believe me, my dear Sir Rowland,

"Very faithfully yours,

"G. MURRAY, Q. ■ G."

On the 21st Sir Rowland had the pleasure of writing, — "Soul has acknowledged the present change of affairs; and we are in peace with him." To this he added, — "I have just left Robert a ball given by the inhabitants to us. The joy of the people in having got rid of Bonaparte is beyond any thing of the kind I ever witnessed."

Lord Castlereagh summoned the Commander of the Forces to meet him in Paris. He kindly undertook to be the bearer of a letter from Sir Rowland.

"My dear Sister,

"Toulouse, April 1814.

"Lord Wellington sets out this day for Paris, and has desired me to remain in command of the army. His Lordship talks of returning in a few days; but I imagine arrangements will be made in England to get the troops home with as little delay as possible, and that he will scarcely have time to come back.

"The Duc D'Angoulême's reception here has been gratifying. Several French generals have been to wait upon him. Marshal Suchet came last night. Soul is, I believe, gone to Paris.

"A part of this army is ordered to be in readiness to embark on an expedition — I suppose, for America. The General Officer commanding it is not named, but should it be offered to me, I shall not accept it. Indeed I am, as you may imagine, truly anxious to get home, and as soon as I can with propriety, I shall be with you.

"I send these hasty lines by Lord W., who is just going. Kind remembrance to all.

"Yours affectionately."

A few days afterwards he wrote, — "I am just sending despatches to Lord Wellington in Paris, and by the opportunity I forward to you a few lines. No instructions have yet arrived for our quitting this country, though I am in hourly expectation of hearing from England on the subject. Every thing is going on extremely well in this part of the country. The joy of the people is not at all abated. The Duc d'Angoulême is gone to visit the French armies. I have not heard how he has been received by them; but as Marshal Suchet and several of the French officers have been in here to wait upon his Royal Highness, I have no doubt they will in return pay every respect to him. We have had rather a curious meeting with the French officers of late. Two days ago three of their general officers dined with me; and as they have been my opponents for many years, we had an opportunity of talking over, in the most friendly manner, events which have occurred in [REDACTED] late [REDACTED] paign."

Sir Rowland Hill was [REDACTED] this time anxious to return to his family, and declined a lucrative post offered him by Lord Wellington, that he might attend to the comfort of his late brother's widow, and the interests of her children. The Duke of Wellington, now raised to that illustrious rank, [REDACTED] returned to Toulouse. Peerages were conferred on five of his generals; in which honoured list appeared the name of Sir Rowland, [REDACTED] Lord Hill of Almaraz and of Hawkstone.

CHAPTER XI.

LORD HILL ARRIVES IN LONDON. — ARRIVAL OF THE NEWS TO MRS. HILL AT THE MINDEN HOTEL. — VISIT TO VICTORIA. — GRAPHEY'S VISIT. — VISIT TO MRS. HILL BY THE EARL OF BATHURST. — VISIT TO MRS. HILL AT MINDEN. — THE BARRINGTON SWORD. — RE-VIEWS AT MINDEN. — SIR JOHN HILL. — MINDEN IN THE QUARRY. — MRS. HILL OBLIGED TO LEAVE MINDEN. —
 COLUMN IN BATHURST. — MRS. HILL. — MRS. WINFIELD. — VISIT TO MRS. BATHURST. — LETTER OF MRS. HILL TO YORK.
 — SPRING OF 1815. — IMPORTANT EVENTS. — THE DEPARTURE OF THE PRINCE OF ORANGE. — THE DUKE OF BRUNSWICK. — MRS. HILL'S POSITION
 IN GRAMMONT. — TROOPS OF PRINCE FREDERIC. — LORD HILL'S POSITION IN THE BATTLE. — WATERLOO.
 — LORD HILL'S PART IN THE BATTLE. — NIGHT IN THE COTTAGE.
 — MEMORANDUM ON THE BATTLE BY SIR JOHN MACKWORTH. —
 FRANCE. — GUELPHIC PARTY. — GOLD CLASP ORTHEZ. — PARIS. — LORD HILL'S PARTY IN — BOIS DE BOULOGNE. —

LORD HILL quitted Toulouse earlier than he expected, and reached London on the 27th of May, 1814. His arrival was thus hastily made known to his sister: —

“ Devonshire Place, 27th May, 1814,

“ My dear Sister,

“ Half-past five

“ I have just time to send you a line to inform you of my arrival here. In a letter I wrote to you some time ago from Toulouse, I mentioned that I should not accept the command of the troops going to America. Since then I was told that it was the particular wish of Government that I should go.
 I therefore thought it right to come here to know the real sentiments of Government on the subject. I cannot now enter into particulars, not having seen Lord Bathurst, nor have I time; but I beg to tell you ■ secret, which ■ have from good authority, that I shall not be called upon to go out, though it will be politic to keep up the idea of a large force going to America. Mr. ■ Mrs. Tudway* are now at dinner waiting for ■ You ■ hear from me to-morrow.

" Yours,
" R. H."

The next letter stated, "I have ■ Lord Bathurst this morning, and have the pleasure to inform you, that I am not likely to be called upon to go out to America for ■ few weeks. In the mean time I shall have the happiness of seeing you, and some changes may take place." Lord Hill in ■ few days removed to the Hanover Hotel, and I well remember being taken by his uncle, the Reverend Rowland Hill, to call upon him there. We went early, and found him at breakfast with several officers. He received ■ with ■ kindness of manner and gentle tone of voice peculiar to himself; yet his quiet step across the ■ to meet his uncle, and the beaming of his eye, showed the happiness he felt at seeing his zealous and devoted relative. The conversation at the breakfast table was extremely animated, and amongst other topics Lord Hill's share of the spoils of Vittoria ■ mentioned. This seemed odd enough, for he prided himself ■ having acquired ■ single item of booty in all his campaigns, save one plain china drinking cup. But his man, looking well out for provant, had actually the seat of his carriage with dried hams and tongues, which he vowed were from King Joseph's larder. After Lord Hill went with Mr. Rowland Hill, to see the picture by Heaphy of the heroes of the Peninsula; and I shall never forget the kind way in which he described to myself, then a boy, the various personages of whom that group composed. He thought all the portraits excellent; but said the Duke of Wellington should not have been painted in a blue frock coat, but a grey one, that being the dress in which he constantly in Spain.

* ■ Tudway was member for Wells, in Somersetshire, and for several years ■ of ■ House of Commons. He was Lord Hill's uncle by marriage. He ■ ceived Lord Hill as ■ guest on his Lordship's ■ in-London.

On the first of June Lord Hill took his seat in the House of Lords. In the midst of all the gaieties consequent on the presence of the illustrious strangers in London, he wrote home, "It is not for pleasure I remain here, but I am told it is quite right that I should attend of the intended fêtes, particularly the Prince's. His Royal Highness was very gracious, and inquired after Sir John. I believe I shall receive my sword Saturday." The sword here alluded to voted to him by the city of London. On the day of presentation, Mr. Rowland Hill arrived at Guildhall a little before the time appointed, and cordially welcomed by the worthy Chamberlain. In the course of conversation, reference was made to the motto the arms of Lord Nelson. The Chamberlain observed, "There not many people who know that this motto is a specimen of the good taste and accuracy of the king.* It originally shown to him in these terms, 'palmam quam meruit ferat.' His Majesty said No; let it be 'palmam qui meruit ferat.'" At length those who had the privilege of admission arrived in quick succession, and presently the cheering of the crowd in the street announced the approach of ■■■ person of distinction. It was Lord Beresford, who was most enthusiastically greeted. Shortly after the ■■■ sounds of welcome ■■■ heard, and Lord Hill came in shaking hands with every one within his reach. The Lord Mayor and the civic authorities then proceeded, with their gallant guests, to the place appointed for the ceremony. Two swords ■■■ placed before the Chamberlain, with ■ gold box containing the freedom of the Corporation, long previously voted to Lord Beresford. The Chamberlain addressed Lord Hill in ■ most appropriate manner, neatly alluding to the fact that his ancestor, of the ■■■ name, was the first Protestant Lord Mayor of the city of London. He then presented the sword, and Lord Hill ■■■ completely overcome in endeavouring to return thanks. Lord Beresford next received his sword and the box before mentioned. No ■■■ were these ceremonies over, than all present crowded round both the heroes, and a hearty shaking of hands took place, such ■ has not been witnessed since those days of joy at our deliver- ■■■ from ■ long and awful war. It ■■■ carried to such an extent, that old Blucher one day, lifting up his aching arm, exclaimed, "Me shake at hands ■■■ more."

* George III.

Wherever Lord Hill appeared in the metropolis he met with a similar reception, till at length he quitted the fêtes of London for the romantic ■■■ and beauteous woodlands of Hawkstone. His arrival was the signal for ■ general burst of rapturous welcome ; and the principal towns through which he passed showed him some token of respect. At Birmingham he was presented with a sword in these terms : " Take it, my Lord, and I will not fail you." " Trust it me," was his reply, " and I will not disgrace it."

His Lordship's visit to Shrewsbury was a triumph. The streets were filled with thousands who came pouring in from every quarter. The trees on the road by which he entered were adorned with flowers, and the very road itself actually strewed with them. Thirteen hundred children of the charity and Sunday schools, were so placed as to be amongst the first whose shouts should hail him as their benefactor and friend. The yeomanry came out to be reviewed by him on his way, and formed part of the procession which accompanied him into the town. Lord Kenyon rode next Lord Hill, who was attended by his gallant brothers and aids-de-camp. Out of respect to the memory of the late Colonel Hill, the trappings of Lord Hill's horse were of black, a marked contrast to the uniforms of fourteen troops of cavalry that followed in his train. The decorated fronts of the houses occupied by ladies, whose handkerchiefs waved the heads of the cheering multitude beneath them. A splendid dinner was given at the Guildhall, where the venerable father of Lord Hill was an object of universal interest. He appeared fresh, vigorous, and animated as the youngest of the guests at that festive board, until he rose amidst the plaudits of the company to return thanks for the honours of the day. Then the tears rolled down his aged cheeks ; but at length his manly spirit conquered all emotions, and he expressed in a few brief words his views of the reception of his country by the Salopians. Amongst those assembled on the proud occasion was India's future bishop, the devoted Heber, who spoke with all the elegance and fervour of his chaste and poetic mind. Nor was the worthy Major Egerton forgotten: loud and long were the cheers that followed the mention of his name, and well did he deserve them.

There seemed to be no end to the festivities, and the eagerness of the people every moment on the increase. The freedom of the Corporation was voted to Lord Hill and his gallant brothers; and, in order to gratify the populace, it was determined that the presentation should take place in the beautiful garden of Mr. Rocke, facing the Quarry—a romantic promenade belonging to the town, where a prodigious concourse had gathered. When the ceremony was over, his Lordship addressed the crowd from the back of a sunk fence between the garden and the Quarry. But this was not enough. The shaking-hand mania of the capital had reached the provinces. Hundreds of hands were extended over the bank, so he good-naturedly knelt upon the top of the fence, and shook heartily as many as he could reach. In the afternoon there was a profusion of tea and cake provided for the ladies and children. Lord Hill, who dined at Mr. Rocke's, every now and then appeared on the terrace; but the people were determined to have him out. An escort of gentlemen was formed to attend him; but, seeing the immense throng, he at first declined going into the Quarry. He, however, yielded and went ; but was obliged to retreat, such was the overwhelming rush to get near him. A diversion was tried. "That's Lord Hill," said one of the escort, pointing to another gentleman. Away went one of the multitude who had not known him ; and the subject of the ruse was obliged to make his escape as fast as he could. Lord Hill acknowledged that he had certainly did run away for the first time — not from his enemies, but from his friends. "I never did," he said, laughing, "fly from the fury of my enemies ; but I have been now obliged to do so from the kindness of my friends."

The Salopians did not suffer these and other transient honours to be all they offered. A splendid column was erected near Shrewsbury, which is one of the noblest Doric pillars in Europe. A vignette in the title-page of this volume correctly represents it. It is called Lord Hill's Column, and has been conveyed to his family.

While Shropshire gave this distinguished reception to Lord Hill, Cheshire also determined to do honour to Lord Combermere, and the former earnestly requested to participate in the festivities. Nor did Chester forget that Lord Hill had been a schoolboy within her ancient walls. The two gallant heroes entered the city in a triumphal procession, and were welcomed with enthusiasm. As they passed along the crowded streets, Lord Hill was perceived to wave his hand with great emotion towards a window filled with ladies, and pointing to one whom his quick eye had caught, he exclaimed, "I shall be with you at breakfast to-morrow." All wondered who this could be. It was the lady of his former tutor, Mrs. Winfield.

When all these festivities had terminated, the only drawback to the happiness of his family was the fear that he might be called upon to go out to America. In August, a letter from Lord Bathurst put an end to their anxiety:—

“ Downing Street, August 10. 1814.

“ My dear Lord,

“ Since I had the pleasure of seeing your Lordship, the information I have received has given me reason to believe that great difficulties would arise from the extended scale of the expedition, which I found would not be less than a hundred sail. If we succeed, it must be undertaken more in the shape of surprise, the place presenting great obstacles, the country and shores many in proportion to the extent of force brought against it. Sir Alexander Cochrane's letter received yesterday confirms me in this opinion; as he proposes an attack at a different point, but in fact with the same object, with a force very inferior to any in contemplation when I proposed the expedition to you.

“ I find also that the collecting such a force as would be fit for your Lordship to command, is attended with much more difficulty than I had imagined, having a regard to the great demand for troops to be stationed in Ireland.

“ Under all these circumstances I am inclined to give up the thoughts of availing myself of your Lordship's zeal to engage in an expedition, which, I am afraid, would have exposed your health more, than, from the little opposition to be expected, it would have added to your glory; and I shall, probably, do nothing more than detach a very small force, to be placed under the command of Major-General Ross, now in America. I take the first opportunity to communicate to you this change; at the same time, I hope you will allow me to consider your services as available, should any occasion happen which would be judged worthy of your Lordship's assistance. I have the honour to be, my dear Lord,

" With great respect,

" Your faithful servant,

" BATHURST."

In September, Lord Hill offered the command in Scotland. The proposal was made by an autograph letter from his Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief: —

" Brixton, September 12. 1814.

" My dear Lord,

" The command in Scotland having become vacant, in consequence of its having been determined that Lord Cathcart should remain an ambassador at Petersburg, both from duty and inclination, I wish to offer the situation to your Lordship, and shall feel much obliged to you if you will communicate to me your wishes on the subject in your early convenience. Believe me to be,

" My dear Lord,

" Yours most sincerely,

" FREDERICK.

" The Rt. Hon. Lieut.-General Lord Hill, K.B."

Lord Hill declined this appointment, and remained in the midst of his family during the autumn and winter.

Early in the spring of 1815, he said one day to his sister *, " Come, let me go to London, and enjoy ourselves," little thinking of the return of Bonaparte from Elba, and its consequences. In the autumn of 1842, I happened to be talking with his Lordship alone one evening, when reference was made to that estimable diplomatist Monsieur

* Miss Emma Hill.

Dedel, the Dutch ambassador, whom he passed a high eulogium. This led to mentioning the Prince of Orange; and he then said, "I will tell you something that few persons know. When Bonaparte came back from Elba, I was in London. One day I was sent for suddenly to the Cabinet. They told me there was a fear of an action being risked on the frontier of the Netherlands, that might prove disastrous. 'We think,' they said, 'your influence would operate to prevent it — will you go?' I answered, 'Yes.' 'When? To-night?' 'No; not to-night; to-morrow morning.' I went home, got ready, and set off; and was able to keep all right till the arrival of the Duke of Wellington. This, I believe, is not generally known." When this conversation was told to his sister, she said she remembered that the evening before his sudden departure, he was to have gone to the opera. At dinner, he quietly remarked, "I cannot go with you this evening; I start off to-morrow morning;" but the nature of his rapid movement was not mentioned. He went, leaving his attached aid-de-camp, Major Egerton, to arrange his affairs, and follow him as far as possible.

Amongst his papers I have found the correspondence of this important mission. It was towards the end of March that he left England. The first note was the following: —

"My dear Lord,

"Tuesday morning, 11 o'clock.

"Two gentlemen arrived last night from Ostend. Their account is very bad. The King of France has lost Lille, &c. and has evacuated Ostend. Bonaparte is on the frontier, but no large body of his troops yet arrived. Government is anxious you should go out immediately, as it is of the greatest importance that you should prevent any rash action, and also that you should persuade Louis to retreat upon Holland, rather than come to England. Pray call in Downing Street ■ three o'clock.

“ Yours very truly,
 “ H. E. BUNBURY.”

As ■ have seen, Lord Hill lost no time in going out. He ■ charged to recommend to the Prince of Orange the “ utmost caution on the part of the forces under his command ;” and to ■ him that it was deemed of the greatest importance that his Royal Highness’s “ army should be preserved in ■ efficient state, until ■ greater mass of force could be brought forward.” It was also to be urged, that it ■ not desirable “ to maintain too advanced a position ; and that it was more creditable, as well ■ more secure, to withdraw before the enemy had assembled such ■ force ■ could compel a retreat, rather than to risk the being obliged by their activity and numbers, to retire in such ■ manner ■ might produce an unfavourable effect upon the public mind.” Also, it was to be conveyed to him, ■ the pleasure of the Prince Regent, “ that the army under his command should avoid any serious engagement, and should withdraw into ■ retired positions, which should be closer, with ■ view both to covering Antwerp and the Dutch frontier, and also to preserving ■ ready communication with the Prussian forces.”

These ■ the principal points in the instructions Lord Hill ■ charged with to his Royal Highness the Prince of Orange, for whom he entertained the highest personal respect ■■■ esteem. Lord Bathurst further explained the tenor of his mission : —

“ My dear Lord, “ Downing Street, ■■■ 29. 1815.

“ In delivering to you a duplicate of my instructions of yesterday’s date, I think it ■■■ be satisfactory to you that I should put down in writing the substance of the explanations with which I have accompanied it.

“ Your Lordship is aware that the instruction ■■■ ■■ maintain so advanced a position is peremptory ; but you know also that it ■■■ given under the impression that Bonaparte ■■■ collecting a force ■■ the frontier. In the event of no such force being in progress, the obedience to the instructions be ■■■ less urgent, if any positive advantage be derived from maintaining that position longer ; but even on this supposition that no force is collecting, the ■■■ for commencing a retrograde movement ■■■ be taken, ■■ ■■ to be able to ■■■ ecute it at any time. If a force be collecting, but ■■ great progress made in it, the obedience to the instruction may be more gradual, but the commencement should not ■■ depend ; first, because the enemy has means of collecting a sufficient force to advance ; and, secondly, because the change of position will be made with more advantage every way, when it appears to be, and in truth is, voluntary. The object of the instruction being not to risk an action, but not to risk, if it can be helped, the change of position with an enemy in force near you. I am,

“ My dear Lord,

“ Yours very sincerely,

“ BATHURST.”

The next day Lord Hill was ■■ board his Majesty’s ship Rosario, and arrived at Brussels ■■ the evening of the first of April. ■■■ lost ■■ time in seeing the Prince of Orange ; and communicated to Lord Bathurst the result of his interview with that gallant personage in the following terms : —

"I beg to acquaint your Lordship that I arrived here yesterday evening, and immediately waited on the Prince of Orange, who had a long conversation with his Royal Highness on the subject of the instructions which I received from your Lordship.

It appears that the army under the Prince is stationed as follows: Head-quarters at Brussels, the Dutch troops coming up towards Genappe, and the British and Hanoverians at Tournay, Ath, &c. It also appears that the troops at these and about the two last-mentioned places have orders to retire in case of being attacked. Conceiving, however, that the British and Hanoverians were too far advanced, I did not think proper to refer his Royal Highness to the late instructions, and to explain to him the conversation I had with your Lordship on the subject; in consequence of which, the Prince has ordered the main body of the troops on the advanced line of Tournay to fall back to-morrow to Enghien, keeping their advance at Louze and Lens, and occupying Tournay and Mons with garrisons, if they are considered tenable.

"This arrangement seems good for to-morrow; but if the intelligence from the frontier is in any way threatening, I hope the Prince will lose no time in bringing the troops further back.

"The Prince informs me that he does not think the enemy is collecting in force on the frontier, and he does not seem to expect any attack. Your Lordship is to inform the King of the Netherlands is here; and, from what I learn, it is the anxious wish of his Majesty to preserve this place—a circumstance, no doubt, very desirable; at the same time, it ought not to be considered if it is to be effected by force. Indeed, I am not aware that the Prince has any intention of making a stand to cover Brussels; and I shall do what I can to prevent our coming in contact with the enemy in any way until we are in a better state to do so.

"By accounts from Vienna, I am told we have reason to expect and hope that the Duke of Wellington will be here in the course of a day or two.

"The Prince of Orange begs me to mention, in case I should write to your Lordship, though he will not doubt write himself, that he never had any intention of fighting a battle on [REDACTED] frontiers [REDACTED] Tournay."

" [REDACTED] April.

" Since writing the accompanying letter, the Quarter-Master General [REDACTED] informed me that the movement [REDACTED] Enghien, alluded [REDACTED] in my letter of yesterday, did not take place this day, but [REDACTED] ordered for to-morrow."

Thus Lord Hill's sudden mission terminated most satisfactorily to all parties, and [REDACTED] particularly acceptable to the Prince of Orange, who always showed marked attention to his views, as well [REDACTED] friendship for his person. To the great joy of all parties, the Duke of Wellington arrived at Brussels on the fourth of April in the night, and the influence of his command was quickly diffused over the whole scene of action.

Lord Hill was placed at Grammont, where, by a curious combination of circumstances, he found himself opposite his old opponent, Girard, whom he surprised at Arroyo de Molinos, and close to the château of the Prince d'Arenberg, whom he took prisoner on that occasion, and who had been [REDACTED] his parole at Shrewsbury. Lord Hill's pay, at this time, [REDACTED] not sufficient to cover his expenses. " He is," said the Duke of Wellington to Lord Bathurst, " again at the head of what is really an army, composed of troops of different nations, with [REDACTED] large staff attached to him, and great expenses to be incurred, and he is paid only [REDACTED] a Lieutenant-General, of whom he has several under his command." His Grace proposed the augmentation of his means; and it was ordered that he should receive the pay and allowances of a General on the staff. But for this, he would have been impoverished by his services.

On the 15th of May he wrote to his sister, Miss Emma Hill, whom he had taken with him to enjoy the pleasures of London:—

“ My dear Emma, “ Grammont, May 15. 1815.

“ I have received your last letter. The collection of French troops ■ ■■ frontier mentioned in my last, appears to have been in consequence of an apprehension on the part of the French that ■ ■■■■ about to attack them. Matters are now nearly in the same state as they have been for some time; the allies ■ ■■ coming up, and in the course of another fortnight, I imagine will be in a state to move forward. The only unpleasant circumstance which has occurred, has been amongst the Saxon troops attached to Blucher's army: nearly the whole of them, about 30,000, declared the other day in favour of Bonaparte, and it was with some difficulty that old Blucher made his escape from them. They have been discovered, and the ringleaders have been shot.

* * * * *

“ Love to all, from your ever affectionate brother,
“ HILL.”

The troops of Prince Frederick of the Netherlands ■■■■ sent over to Lord Hill, and his anxiety for the comfort of the ■■■■ appears in a letter he addressed to his Royal Highness:—

“ Sir, “ Grammont, May 17. 1815.

“ Your Royal Highness having been pleased to ■ ■■ that you would allow me to see your corps, I shall be happy to have that honour whenever ■ ■■ may be convenient to your Royal Highness for me to do so.

“ Considering that your corps is rather dispersed, it ■ ■■ by no means my wish ■ ■■ give the troops a long march, for the purpose of collecting ■ any particular point. I can ride to their several cantonments, and ■ them in brigades or divisions, or in any manner you may be pleased to fix. I have only to request that your Royal Highness will have the goodness ■ let ■ know the arrangements you make on the occasion, in order that I may be punctual ■ the time, and ■ keep the troops waiting.

"I have the honour ■ be,

"Your Royal Highness's very obedient and faithful servant,

"HILL.

"H. R. Highness Prince Frederick of the Netherlands,
&c. &c. &c."

His great consideration for the soldiers made Lord Hill exceedingly beloved by them. I remember ■ private of his corps telling me that, on ■ very hot day, at ■ review, he was overheard saying to an officer, "Let us shorten these manœuvres; it is very hot: you must not fatigue your men." A whisper ran through the ranks, "Bless him! there he is: Father Hill again!"

On the 22d of May Lord Hill thus expressed himself, in writing to his brother Sir Francis Hill, then in England: — "I returned late last night from an inspection of our frontier. Every thing here is much in the same state as it has been for some time. Bonaparte is busy in France, and the allies ■ coming forward, but I imagine it will take ■ few weeks yet before the latter ■ be well up. By all accounts, Paris is in ■ very unsettled state. Many deserters come to this country, but in general they ■ soldiers of the last conscriptions. General Latour ■ into ■ yesterday while I was there. He has served a long time with Bonaparte, and [REDACTED] considered a distinguished officer: he is [REDACTED] native of this country. He left Paris two days ago, and confirms the accounts of the capital being in [REDACTED] very disturbed state. If you have nothing better to do, I think you could spend [REDACTED] short time in this country very pleasantly: you could consider my house [REDACTED] your head-quarters."

Sir Francis Hill and the Honourable Charles Shore, now Lord Teignmouth, paid Lord [REDACTED] a visit [REDACTED] Grammont, where they found [REDACTED] agreeable sojourn until the approach of the French, and the certainty of [REDACTED] battle, caused Lord [REDACTED] to recommend their departure to Antwerp.

Lord Hill was in the constant receipt of information respecting the movements of the enemy, which he [REDACTED] municated to the Duke of Wellington at Brussels. On the 13th of June he was informed that, at one o'clock in the morning, the French outposts and pickets all fell back towards Manbeuge, and that it [REDACTED] generally believed that [REDACTED] attack [REDACTED] intended on the 15th. Marshals Soult and Drouet, it [REDACTED] added, [REDACTED] in command of nearly 120,000 picked troops; but Bonaparte had not yet [REDACTED] down from Paris, and the National Guards were in full march to the frontier. On the afternoon of the 15th information [REDACTED] sent to Lord Hill from the Duke of Wellington that, in consequence of [REDACTED] attack made upon the Prussian posts [REDACTED] the river Sambre in the morning, his Grace had ordered the army to be collected that night. The movements of the army [REDACTED] notified, and Lord Hill [REDACTED] his instructions to Prince Frederick:—

" Sir,

" 1815, 3 A. M.

" I have this moment received orders from the Duke of Wellington to move the troops under my command, and Grace requests that your Royal Highness will occupy Oudenarde with 500 men, and collect the first division of the army of the Low Countries and the Hanoverian brigade at Sotteghe. These movements place without delay.

" I have, &c.

" HILL.

" His Royal Highness Prince Frederick of Orange."

All the orders of the Duke addressed to Lord Hill executed with his accustomed judgment. His whole mind filled with the momentous interest of the coming struggle for the destinies of Europe. The history of the fight at Quatre Bras, and the retreat to Waterloo, belongs not to this memoir. Nor need any allusion be made to the ball Brussels, from which the chieftains were summoned to the field, further than to say that Lord Hill was not there. He was at his post, attending to the movements of the enemy and his own duties.

The night previous to the battle of Waterloo spent by Lord Hill and his staff, in a small house by the side of the road leading from Brussels to the field. At the commencement of the day, his corps the slope of Merke Braine to the right of the Nivelles road, covering the right wing of the general line. Later in the day it advanced, and added greatly to the decisive issue. As the whole army moved to the left, the divisions of Lord Hill's force up, and engaged in the thickest of the battle. His Lordship's own station a spot where a little rise enabled him to see the enemy's

It was a post of great danger from its exposure to the shot, which flew about him in every direction; but he remained there, coolly marking all that he deemed of importance, and only leaving it occasionally to animate by his presence any faltering portion of the line. He manifested the energy as at Arroyo de Molinos. His usual gentle and reserved demeanour was exchanged for a decisive and spirited air of command, regulated by his prudence. He foreseen the dreadful attack made by the Imperial Guards; and, having placed himself at the head of a brigade, contributed greatly to the last decisive repulse of the choicest troops of Napoleon. Lord Hill was following this advantage with his customary ardour, when the Duke ordered the advance of the whole army. Cordial were his Grace's acknowledgments of the services rendered by his Lordship at Waterloo, the full extent of them never to have been known to the public.*

* show how Lord Hill's corps was engaged, I give a randum placed recently in my hands by Lordship's aid-de-camp:—

Lord's Corps engaged

SIR F. ADAM'S BRIGADE.				1st BRIGADE, G. L.
		174	0			69	17
71st	24	160	3	2d	18	79	7
95th	20	124	0	3d	17		81
				4th	15	77	14
COLONEL MITCHELL.				Hanoverians 70
	11		0	British	87	577
51st	9	20	0	Total, exclusive of	157	895	727
	7	21	0
		577	3

Sir Digby Mackworth, who was on the [redacted] of Lord Hill, has kindly communicated what he witnessed of his General's efforts at the grand crisis of the day. "He placed himself," Sir Digby states, "at the head of his Light Brigade, 52d, 71st, and 95th, and charged the [redacted] of the Imperial Guard, as they were advancing against [redacted] Guards. The Light Brigade [redacted] lying under the brow of the hill, and gave and [redacted] received volleys within half pistol shot distance. Here Lord Hill's horse [redacted] shot under him, and, [redacted] he ascertained the next morning, [redacted] shot in five places. The General [redacted] rolled [redacted] and severely bruised, but in the mêlée this was unknown to [redacted] for about half an hour. We knew not what was become of him: we feared he had been killed; and none can tell you the heartfelt joy which we felt when he rejoined us, not seriously hurt." When the tremendous day [redacted] over, Lord Hill and his staff again re-occupied the little cottage they left in the morning. His two gallant brothers, Sir Robert Hill and Colonel Clement Hill, had been removed wounded to Brussels; the party was, nevertheless, nine in number. A soup made by Lord Hill's servant from two fowls [redacted] all their refreshment, after hours of desperate fighting without [redacted] morsel of food. Lord [redacted] himself [redacted] bruised and full of pain. All night long, the groans and shrieks of sufferers [redacted] the chief sounds that met their [redacted]. It [redacted] to them all a night of the greatest misery. The men whom the nations of Europe [redacted] about to welcome with acclamations, and to entertain in palaces, could only exchange sigh for sigh with each other in [redacted] wretched cottage. Such [redacted] war ■■■ to the winners. May ■ gracious God ■■■ make it to cease in all the earth!

Sir Digby Mackworth, fatigued ■ he was, had the resolution to record the proceedings of the past day. His memorandum, kindly sent for the service of this volume, bears date "June 18th, 11 P.M. Waterloo." After describing certain well known circumstances, he proceeded:—"The cavalry and infantry repeatedly charged in masses, under ■■■ of ■ tremendous fire from 240 pieces of artillery. Four times were ■■ guns in possession of their cavalry, and ■ often did the bayonets of our infantry ■■■ them. For upwards of ■ hour our little squares ■■■ ■ rounded by the élite of the French cavaliers: they gallantly stood within forty paces of us, unable to leap over the bristling line of bayonets, unwilling to retire, and determined never to surrender. Hundreds of them were dropping in all directions from our murderous fire, yet as fast as they dropped, others came up to supply their places. Finding at last that it ■■■ in vain to attempt to break our determined ranks, they swept round our rear, and rushing into the Nivelles road attempted to cut their way back to their ■■■ lines; but the whole road ■■■ lined with our infantry ■■ both sides, and at the advanced part of it ■■■ ■ almost impassable barricado of felled trees. Here ■■■ the remainder of these gallant Cuirassiers, of whom not one ■■■ taken without ■ wound. The cannonade continued without intermission; and about six o'clock ■■ saw heavy columns of infantry supported by dragoons returning for a fresh attack. It ■■■ evident it would be ■ desperate, and we thought probably a decisive. Every felt how much depended on this terrible moment. A black mass of the Grenadiers of the Imperial Guard with music playing, and the great Napoleon ■ their head, ■ rolling onward from the farm of La Belle Alliance. With rapid pace they descended. Those spaces in ■ lines which death had opened and left vacant, ■ covered with bodies of cavalry. The point at which the enemy aimed ■ now evident ; it ■ an angle formed by a brigade of Guards, and the light brigade of Lord Hill's corps. Lord Hill ■ there in person. The French moved on with arms sloped, au pas de charge. They began to ascend the hill. In a few seconds they were within a hundred paces of us, and ■ yet not a shot had been fired. The awful moment was now at hand. A peal of ten thousand thunders burst ■ once on their devoted heads. The storm swept them down ■ a whirlwind which rushes over the ripe corn ; they paused ; their advance ceased ; they commenced firing from the heads of their columns, and attempted to extend their front ; but death had already caused too much confusion among them ; they crowded instinctively behind each other to avoid ■ fire which ■ intolerably dreadful. Still they stood firm — la garde meurt, ■ ne ■ rend pas. For half ■ hour this horrible butchery continued. At last, seeing all their efforts vain, all their courage useless, deserted by their Emperor who was already flown, unsupported by their comrades who were already beaten, the hitherto Invincible Old Guard gave way, and fled in every direction. One spontaneous and almost painfully animated 'Hurrah!' burst from the victorious ranks of England. The line at once advanced, generals, officers, soldiers, all partaking in common enthusiasm. The battle Guns, prisoners, munition, waggons, baggage, horses, successively fell into hands. Night and fatigue compelled to halt. We halted on each side of the Genappe road, and in short time columns of Prussians pouring along in pursuit of the enemy. Each battalion cheered us in passing. The officers saluted, and many embraced us. Never witnessed enthusiastic moment. We felt amply rewarded for the exertions of the day. The Prussians continued the pursuit without interruption. Lord Hill and staff retired to small cottage where we now are. We have but one room between nine of us, including his Lordship. All but myself are asleep."

In reading the various accounts of this battle, it is curious to observe the discrepancies to the time it commenced. Lord Hill has however settled this point. On arriving in London the autumn after the conflict, he passed his first evening at the house of his friend Lord Teignmouth. "Can you tell me," said Lord Teignmouth, "at what time the action commenced?" Lord Hill replied, "I took two watches into action with On consulting my stop watch after the battle over, I found that the first gun fired ten minutes before twelve."

The day after the battle, Sir Noel Hill wrote thus:—

"My dear Maria,

"Brussels, June 19. 1815.

"We well. and Clement are wounded; but, thank God, not dangerously. Robert's wound is and will confine him some time. I have seen the surgeon who [redacted] him, who assures me there is [redacted] the slightest chance of any bad consequences. The ball—musket—has passed through the fleshy part of the right arm, and slightly grazed the breast.

“Clement was pinned to his [redacted] by a fellow’s sword through the fleshy part of the thigh, and his wound may [redacted] fine him [redacted] time, and it must be painful, but there is no [redacted] of danger attending it. Now for the pleasant part of my story.

“We gained a complete victory yesterday, Bony in person commanding the French. He has retreated, leaving most of [redacted] artillery, and immense numbers of prisoners, in [redacted] hands. Our army has advanced this morning.

* * * * *

“Yours ever most affectionately,
“T. N. H.”

To this letter Colonel Clement Hill would add a postscript. “To convince you all there is not much amiss with me, I add a line to Tom’s account of me. My wound may confine [redacted] for a short time, but I have scarcely any pain, and we [redacted] all in high spirits [redacted] the complete drubbing Bony has had, towards which I hope the Blues did their share.” As this brave officer, who made thus light of a severe wound, [redacted] being conveyed to Brussels, he [redacted] up to [redacted] not quite [redacted] gallant [redacted] himself, who he had [redacted] to think [redacted] frightened out of the field. He [redacted] trudging along at quick march. “Eh, my good fellow,” cried the Colonel, “I thought you were wounded: were you not?” “No, no!” said he, “but I had some very narrow escapes!” Lord Hill himself soon recovered his bruises, and begged Sir Noel to go to the field and look for the horse that [redacted] shot under him, and [redacted] dead to have the poor animal buried; if not, to put him out of [redacted] misery. He was found quite dead, and on examination it [redacted] discovered that he had been shot in several places.

His Lordship now passed [redacted] with the army into France. Sir Noel Hill's letter shows they [redacted] in high spirits:—

“ My dear Maria,

“ Caen, June [redacted] 1815.

“ Robert and Clement are going [redacted] as well as possible; but I [redacted] say you will get later accounts from them than this. Rowland and myself [redacted] quite well, and have only to regret that [redacted] brothers cannot witness the finishing stroke of Master Bony. He cannot surely withstand the storm that is browning all around him, after what he suffered [redacted] the 18th. He brought against us one half of his army, and by far the best troops he had; so that we — even this army — need [redacted] be much alarmed at the other half, without the assistance of the Russians, Austrians, &c. who, it is understood, [redacted] well advanced; and perhaps our having halted to-day is to allow their armies [redacted] come up.

“ Bonaparte's orders to the peasantry and people in general, to defend the country, have not [redacted] far been attended to; but, [redacted] the contrary, [redacted] have been well received, particularly in [redacted] place. Rowland and his staff [redacted] into the town without [redacted] single soldier. The white flag [redacted] immediately hoisted, and [redacted] band of music with [redacted] of the inhabitants came [redacted] welcome [redacted] arrival, singing and playing Vive Henri Quatre. Bavay, the first town [redacted] entered in France, had still the eagle standing in the market-place, [redacted] the people did [redacted] very happy to [redacted] us, so that one cannot judge exactly of the [redacted] of all; but I should think [redacted] late [redacted] would determine [redacted] of those who [redacted] wavering, in favour of the good [redacted].

“ Rowland [redacted] gone with the Duke of Wellington to pay a visit to old Blücher, who is within a few miles of us. The poor old fellow was terribly maltreated in one of his affairs with the enemy. His horse was shot, and they rode over him; but he takes a deal of killing. His head being tolerably thick, he received but little harm.

* * * * *

" Love to all.

" Yours most affectionately."

Lord Hill's letter describes his visit to Blucher: —

" My dear Sister,

" Cateau, June 1815.

" Before this time you will have heard, in various ways, of the glorious result of our battle of Waterloo, which I really inclined to think that the fate of Europe was decided. Bonaparte is still retreating, and we are following him. It is possible he may endeavour to collect at Laon, where there is a position; but in my mind he cannot again make any serious stand against us. The Prussians are close to us; but the Russians and Austrians are at a considerable distance, as it was not intended to commence operations till the 24th — this day. As soon, however, as they hear of what has taken place on this side, I have no doubt they will press forward.

" Yesterday I rode with the Duke of Wellington to see Blucher. We found the Marshal amusing himself with Bonaparte's hat, stars, and personal baggage, which with his carriage was taken by some Prussian cavalry. I verily believe there was a tremendous battle fought at Waterloo; and it is astonishing how any could escape. I have several who have seen Robert and Clement, and perfectly easy on their account. The particulars of their wounds will have been described to you. The King of France is coming to this town to-day: the people seem rejoiced at the event. Let us be thankful for all mercies; and forget that Providence which has protected us, and brought to us the happy prospect of affairs. Alas, poor Currie!* Bridgeman is doing quite well. Kind remembrance to Sir John, and all dear friends.

“ Yours ever affectionately,

“ H.”

The Duke of Wellington's despatch from Waterloo contained the following paragraph relative to the services of Lord Hill: “ I am also particularly indebted to General Lord Hill, for his assistance and conduct upon this upon other occasions.” He received, in a most complimentary manner from the Prince Regent, the Guelphic Order for his distinguished exertions in leading the Hanoverian troops in the battle of the 18th. It was moreover soon afterwards announced to him by the Duke of York, that he was to wear a gold clasp in commemoration of the battle of Orthez.

The beginning of July, when the posts at Paris evacuated by agreement were given up, Lord Hill marched to take possession of them. They were surrendered in three successive days; and the evening of the first he held a conference at the Barrier of St. Denis, accompanied by his staff. The French General awaited his arrival, attended only by a single aid-de-camp. In the distance a French column was perceived entering as the British troops approached; but a French soldier stood on duty near the barrier. Just as Lord Hill and his staff approached close to him, this fellow actually levelled and discharged his * Lord Hill thus mentions Colonel Currie in a letter to Wellington: — “ Lieutenant Colonel Currie had been in the army, I believe, twenty years, and in my staff upwards of thirty years, during which latter period he rendered most valuable services to me and to my country.”

musket at the English party, but providentially the shot proved harmless. A French aid-de-camp instantly galloped up and apologized, making the mistake that the soldier was intoxicated; but a similar outrage had well nigh proved fatal to the officer sent into Paris by the Duke of Wellington with a flag of truce, for he was shot through the body. Lord Hill, however, took no further notice of the circumstance.

At Paris Lord Hill occupied the Hotel de Montesquieu, where he entertained many of his Shropshire friends whom the stirring events of the period attracted to Paris. He also participated in the brilliant fêtes and re-unions, and himself gave a very splendid entertainment. Then came the grand reviews. Whenever he could, he escaped from Paris into the open country, near the Bois de Boulogne, enjoying the quietude of its groves more than the magnificence of the saloons of Paris. From this place he wrote to his sister, "I have every reason to think that I shall not be prevented having the pleasure of seeing you in Shropshire about the 17th or 18th of next month. I have spoken to the Duke of Wellington on the subject, and find there is no objection whatever to my returning to England for a short time. I should have wished to have been at home for a few days before the 19th, but I fear I cannot well leave Paris before the 12th, chiefly on account of a grand review of the Russian army, which is to take place on the 10th or 11th. That is also the period about which the British army may expect to be moved from the neighbourhood of Paris, for the purpose of being cantoned in the towns ■■■ villages towards Amiens, &c. ■■■ then expressed his opinion on graver matters, thus:—

“ With respect to the state of public affairs, it is difficult for me to say what it is. I fear, however, that the Bourbons ■■■ not very popular, and that the Jacobins and other parties ■■■ kept in order entirely by the great armies which are in this country. One thing I ■■■ quite clear should be done, which is, that the allies ought not to leave without so completely clipping the wings of France ■■■ to render its government, be it what it may, totally incapable of disturbing the peace of Europe again: the only way of doing which is to disband all the present forces, and to occupy with foreign troops, for some time to come, all the strong towns on the frontiers of France. I am also of opinion that all Napoleon’s trophies ought to be removed, and all the plunder taken by him ■■■ stored to its proper owners. I have been living in the country ■■■ days, but return to Paris to-day. I expect to meet Lord Castlereagh at dinner at Prince Frederick’s.”

We have now traced the ■■■ of Lord Hill through the most stirring periods of his active military life, passed without failing in any undertaking, ■■■ having made ■■■ personal enemy. Conscious of his own powers, he veiled them with ■■■ unequalled modesty, ■■■ that jealousy was disarmed. Whatever opportunities were placed in his way he ■■■ used them to enrich himself, and his nature was too noble to make the character of another ■■■ stepping-stone to his ■■■ fame. With powers of mind adequate to the most original military conceptions, he was, ■■■ to orders ■■■ ■■ principal, ■■■ punctiliously obedient ; and if ■■■ he did take ■ step not prescribed, it ■■■ always in accordance with instructions, and led to ■■■ brilliant achievement without the precedent of infringing any rule.

CHAPTER XII.

ENTAIL OF LORD HILL'S PEERAGE.—HE LEAVES THE COMMAND.—
 HIS LETTER TO THE DUKE OF WELLINGTON.—
 HIS DEPARTURE FOR CAMBRAY.—BOAR-HUNT.—CHÂTEAU MARIEN —KINDNESS OF THE DUKE OF WELLINGTON.—
 LORD HILL AT WATERLOO.—GAIETIES AT CAMBRAY.—HILL'S IN HIS PLACE.—SOUTHEY'S PEERAGE IN WAR.—LORD HILL'S
 M.P. FOR BATHURST.—HILL OF THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.—
 LETTER TO MR. WELLS.—
 LORD HILL THE COMMAND IN THE MASTER OF THE ORDNANCE.—HE DECLINES BOTH.—THE
 DUKE OF WELLINGTON PRIME MINISTER.—PROPOSAL TO LORD HILL TO TAKE THE COMMAND OF THE ARMY.—HE ACCEPTS IT.—HIS ORDERS.—HORSE GUARDS.—ROOM CHAIR.—LORD HILL UNWELL.—KINDNESS OF
 GEORGE IV.—HIS MAJESTY'S ACT IN FAVOUR OF LORD
 HILL.—HIS HIGHNESS OF DUTY.—
 THE STEAM COACH.—THE OFFICER WHO RIDE.—
 NOTE ON THE LADY MATRESS.—

The day before Lord Hill left London, on his mission to the Prince of Orange, he expressed to Lord Bathurst his earnest wish that his peerage might be entailed, in the event of his dying without issue, on the eldest son of his late brother, Colonel Hill. This was the only thing he asked for himself or family of the Government. Lord Bathurst expressed himself favourable to the request; but the important succession of events which happened immediately afterwards prevented further attention to the subject.

In October, 1815, Lord Hill, during a short visit to London, renewed his application, and informed his father of the result.

“ Hanover Square, Oct. 14. 1815, 8 A.M.

“ My dear Father,

“ Yesterday I had a satisfactory conversation with Lord Bathurst on the subject of my peerage and pension; and I think it right to acquaint you, that should it please God to take me from this earthly world, it is settled that I will descend to my heirs male of my late dear brother. I mention this circumstance for your own private information, and to communicate to such few only as you may think proper. It appears to me that it had better not be made public, nor even communicated to dear Rowland, for fear of raising his expectations too high.

“ Noel and myself are just going off. God bless you, my dear sir. Believe me to be,

“ Your very dutiful and affectionate son,

“ HILL.”

Lord Bathurst lost no time in laying the matter before the Prince Regent, and was commissioned to acquaint Lord Hill that his Royal Highness graciously acquiesced in his desire.

“ My dear Lord,

“ Downing Street, Oct. 20. 1815.

“ I have great satisfaction in informing your Lordship, that the Prince Regent has acceded to your wishes in the most gratifying manner to you.

“ I have commanded me to acquaint you, that I have great pleasure in extending the same to the issue of your eldest brother, in case of your dying without issue, as a proof of the regard he entertains of your meritorious services, and of the regard due to the very respectable family of which you are so distinguished an ornament.

“ I have the honour to be, my dear Lord,

“ Yours very sincerely,

“ BATHURST.

“ The Lord Hill, &c. &c.”

Lord Hill had gone to Paris when this letter was written, where he remained till December, when he wrote home to say he should probably soon quit that capital:—

“ My Sister,

Paris, Dec. 11. 1815.

“ The King and the French ministers conceiving that the country is now sufficiently quiet, to enable [redacted] to carry on the [redacted] of their government without [redacted] of foreign troops, [redacted] are, in consequence, to leave Paris before the end of this month. Our line of cantonments will be Cambrai, Valenciennes, &c., and you will have heard that the [redacted] organisation of the army is nearly as follows:—

The cavalry, with its artillery, under Lord Combermere, about	- - - -	3,500
The infantry, with its proportion of artillery, Lord Hill, about	- - - -	25,000
Reserve artillery, &c. &c. &c.	- - - -	1,500
Making the British contingent, of	- - - -	30,000

“ Our stations, you will see, will not be [redacted] than one day's journey from Calais, consequently there will be but little inconvenience in visiting England whenever we please. I have not, however, any intention of coming home this winter, much as I should like to spend my Christmas holidays with the boys at Hawkestone.

“ Marshal Ney's execution has caused very little sensation in Paris; and the Act of Amnesty, which has been passed since that event, [redacted] to give general satisfaction. Upon the whole, the Duc de Richelieu's conduct and appearance [redacted] much in his favour; and I really hope he will be able to make the poor Bourbons more esteemed than they appear to be [redacted] present.

* * * * *

“ I [redacted] not know what kind of weather you have in England, but it is so cold here I can scarcely hold my pen. The mail [redacted] last Friday is not yet arrived. Clement is just come into my room. The Blues march on Thursday, and will be [redacted] Boulogne on the 26th.”

Lord Hill, when he left Paris, proceeded to Cambray, but ■■■ obliged to go to England much sooner than he intended, by the unexpected tidings of pecuniary losses, arising out of circumstances they could not control, which had occurred to his family. He made this known to the Duke of Wellington, and received the following noble and generous reply: —

“ My dear Hill,

“ Paris, ■■■ 1816.

“ I received only yesterday evening your letter of the 16th, and I am very much concerned for the unfortunate circumstances which have occasioned the necessity for your return to England. I consent to it, as well as to that of Sir Nool. Let him apply through the official channel, but he need not wait for the ■■■

“ In the existing state of public and private credit in England, I am apprehensive that you will find it difficult to procure the money which you will require. I have a large ■■■ of money which is entirely at my command; and I assure you that I could not apply it in a manner more satisfactory to me than in accommodating you, my dear Hill, to whom I am under ■■■ many obligations, and your father, for whom I entertain the highest respect, although I ■■■ not acquainted with him. I trust, therefore, that if you should experience the difficulty which I expect you will, in finding money ■■■ settle the disagreeable ■■■ in which your family is involved, you will let ■■■ know it, and I will immediately put my man of business in London in communication with yours, in order to apply it to you.

“ Ever yours ■■■ sincerely,

“ WELLINGTON.”

Though it did not become necessary for Lord Hill to avail himself of the assistance ■■■ munificently offered, he ■■■ retained the most vivid sense of the Duke's extreme kindness on this trying occasion.

On his Lordship's return to Cambay he was much occupied by the encampments, reviews, and other military duties. In winter the officers enjoyed the sports of the field, and complaint was made that they rode over the young corn. This Lord Hill immediately checked as far as his command extended; but some English gentlemen, not in the army, joined the camp, whom it was not easy to manage. Lord Hill, however, contrived to prevent all annoyance to the farmers by mild but firm interference. His own favourite diversion was boar-hunting, and he had a most providential escape. Having posted himself at the edge of a wood, a boar, which the beaters had driven out, rushed furiously towards him. While every one else was alarmed for his safety, he coolly awaited its approach. As it was within reach of a short spear, he gave it such a thrust on the side that it turned on one side, when he suddenly plunged the spear into its heart, and laid it dead at his feet. The spear broke in the body of the boar, and the Duke of Wellington sent him a present of a new one: the tusks and part of the skull are kept at Hawkstone in memory of the event.

The Château Maniers was, at this time, the residence of Lord Hill, at Cambay, and the excellent taste of Colonel Egerton, his aid-de-camp, added not a little to the comforts of his establishment. Early in 1817, he had a severe attack of illness, and could write only a very short letter:—

"Maniers, Tuesday, Jan. 1817.

"I have indeed, my dear Sister, suffered a good deal. God Almighty has, however, enabled me to bear up against all the attacks, and has restored me to a state of mind and body calm and composed. My illness has been something of the same I had in Portugal, a kind of bilious fever. The symptoms on this occasion have, however, been much

Egerton and his wife living in the house: they very attentive. Poor John's attention is very great indeed. This will not leave Cambray till to-morrow, when Noel will write. Kindest remembrances to all, from

Your affectionate Brother,

"H."

A week later, on announcing that he had been able to take a carriage airing, he remarked, "Nothing can have been kinder than the behaviour of the Duke of Wellington towards me. When he first heard of my illness, not knowing that I had been ill was the case, he asked me to go to his house in Paris, for a change. Since then I have had a second letter from him, in which he says, "I should think that a change of air would be the best thing for you; and if that is recommended to you, I hope you will not hesitate a moment about going wherever you may be advised. To see your friends in England would do you good, well gratify them after this illness." On getting better, he went to England, and tried the Cheltenham waters with success.

After his recovery he resumed his duties at Cambray. The Duke of Wellington had a house at Mont St. Martin, where he was joined by the Duchess. Their Graces showed the most kind attention to the officers and their ladies, who were constantly entertained by them with the greatest hospitality.

In the month of September, Lord Hill, accompanied by his brother Colonel Clement Hill, his nephew Mr. George Hill, and his sister Miss Emma Hill, with Colonel and Mrs. Egerton and Colonel Abercromby, made a tour through the Netherlands. On arriving at Waterloo, the party visited the cottage where Lord Hill and his staff passed the two memorable nights before and after the battle. The poor old woman who resided there no sooner saw Lord Hill and Colonel Egerton, than she was quite overjoyed with joy and surprise. The party made her happy by a handsome present, and then sought out a still more miserable dwelling where the wounds of Colonel Clement Hill were dressed before he was removed to Brussels. There they fell in with the far-famed guide of Bonaparte. On a rising ground near the Château of Hougoumont, they recognised the spot where poor Colonel Currie fell, near which his body was found and buried the morning after the battle, by Colonel Egerton and John Holding, the servant of Lord Hill. They next went on to Nivelles, and called on a worthy Belgian family who had treated Lord Hill and his staff with great hospitality. Their tour, however, was shortened by their desire to return to Cambray, in time for a magnificent fête given by the Duke of Wellington; and also to be present at two reviews, one of the army of Russia, the other of the British, Hanoverian, Danish, and Saxon troops.

On the termination of his duties at Cambray, Lord Hill came to England. At Hawkstone there had gathered round his venerable father such a family circle, as has seldom assembled at the board of any parent. Lord Hill took his place at table, daily, with six brothers and four sisters, besides the widow of his lamented eldest brother, whose children he regarded with paternal solicitude. There ■■■■ lived ■■■■ unaffected human being than Sir John Hill. When he heard that his ■■■■ had survived Waterloo, he exclaimed, "God bless the lads!"; and their presence in his ■■■■ house seemed to add fresh vigour to his old age.

In the ■■■■ and enjoyments of home, Lord Hill's chief anxiety seemed to be to add to the cheerfulness and comfort of all about him. His farm and his garden occupied ■■■■ portion of his time, and he ■■■■ fond of hunting, shooting, and fishing in ■■■■ quiet way. The poor were the objects of his peculiar kindness. A soldier's wife on the estate had requested him to make some application regarding her husband, which ■■■■ successful. He received the answer in his favour just as he was going out with the hounds. After riding a little way he disappeared, and nobody knew where he ■■■■ gone. At length it was discovered that he had quietly withdrawn from the field, to carry in person the acceptable tidings to the poor woman who was anxiously expecting them. The farmers used to be delighted to see him, when he rested in their houses on his shooting excursions. He would play with their children in the most winning manner, taking them ■■■■ his knee, and amusing them in every way he could devise. The only thing which seemed to embarrass him was the extreme modesty of his nature; ■■■■ that actually when about to confer the greatest favour, he would appear ■■■■ confused than other persons would have been if they had solicited it.

So simple were his manners, that it was difficult for an ordinary observer to imagine him possessed of any of those qualities by which he had gained his high reputation. But whenever it became necessary, even in private life, that he should give a prompt opinion or act upon an emergency, the quickness with which he perceived and decided showed instantly that his genius was veiled under his usual quiet demeanour. Mr. Wilberforce, after passing a few hours with him in unravelling the intricacies of an affair requiring much firmness, prudence, and delicacy, could not help saying to Lord Teignmouth, "I love Lord Hill." His Majesty George the Fourth was exceedingly attached to him, and selected him to bear the standard of England at his coronation in the year 1821. In his visits to London he was always much noticed by that monarch, who appreciated to the fullest extent his meritorious public services and his amiable qualities in private.

We have already noticed the great confidence reposed in him by the Duke of Wellington. How entirely it was deserved in every respect appears in a letter to his Grace, on the subject of information he was asked to supply for Southey's History of the Peninsular War. The applicant was a nobleman of high rank; and Lord Hill immediately wrote to the Duke.

"My dear Lord Duke,

"London 13. 1821.

"Some days ago I received the accompanying note from
" * * * *, and as it relates to the general proceedings of your army in Spain and Portugal, I cannot think of sending an answer to it without your sanction. It has been rumoured [REDACTED] II. Southey has been furnished with documents on the subject by your Grace's permission: [REDACTED] that [REDACTED] the case, I cannot give him fresh information, and if it is not the [REDACTED] I am sure [REDACTED] ought not to supply him with any memoranda I may have. I have destroyed, since I [REDACTED] home, many papers relative to our operations in the Peninsula. I have, however, several papers still in my possession, and amongst them the valuable instructions I received from your Grace at various times. I beg, however, to state that I would not on any [REDACTED] allow them, [REDACTED] any part of them, to go out of my hands, particularly for publication, unless it is your wish that I should do [REDACTED]

"I am rejoiced to have it in my power to say, that Rowland [REDACTED] this day elected member for the county of Salop. The proceedings throughout the whole of this business have been most gratifying to our family. The events alluded to in the first part of this letter have contributed in no small degree to Rowland's success; for [REDACTED] can assure your Grace that your glorious campaign in the Peninsula, in which I had the good fortune to be [REDACTED] humble partaker, has not been forgotten by the Shropshire freeholders. The family [REDACTED] Hawkstone join [REDACTED] in expressing to your Grace, our best thanks for your kind and good wishes contained in the last letter I had the pleasure to receive from you.

"I have, &c.

"HILL."

The Duke replied with equal kindness and truth.

"My dear Hill,

"London, [REDACTED] 25. 1821.

"I have received your letter, and sincerely congratulate you upon the [REDACTED] of your nephew, and this fresh instance of the deserved respect in which you and your family [REDACTED] [REDACTED] the county of Salop.

"In respect to Mr. Southey, I have heard in the whole that he [REDACTED] writing a History of the War in the Peninsula; but I have never received an application from him, either directly [REDACTED] indirectly, for information [REDACTED] the subject. If I [REDACTED] received such an application, I would have told him what I have told others, that the subject was ■ serious ■ be ■■■■ with ; ■ that if any real authenticated history of that ■■■ by ■ ■ ■ author worthy of writing it were given, it ought to convey to the public the real truth, and ought to show what nations really did, when they put themselves in the situation the Spanish and Portuguese nations ■■■ placed themselves; and that I would give information and materials to no author who would not undertake ■ write upon that principle. I think, however, that the period of the war is ■■■ near; and the character and reputation of nations, ■ well as individuals, ■ too much involved in the description of these questions for me to recommend, ■ ■■■■ encourage, any author to write such ■ history ■ some, I [fear], would encourage at the present moment.

" This is my opinion upon the subject in general, and I should have conveyed it to Mr. Southey, if he and his friends had applied to me.

" In respect to your reference to me, I receive it, as every thing that comes from you, ■ a mark of your kind attention to me. Unless you approve of the principle which I have above stated, there is nothing to prevent you from giving Mr. Southey any information you please; but I should wish you not to give him any original papers from me, as that would be in fact to involve me in his work without attaining the object which I have in view, which is, a true history.

" Believe me,

" Ever yours most sincerely,

" WELLINGTON.

" General the Lord Hill, G. C. B. &c. &c."

Upon receiving this communication, Lord Hill assured the Duke that " no original paper relative to his Grace's military proceedings, ■■■ any part of their contents, should pass out of his hands unless he wished them returned to himself." This the Duke by no means desired, but answered the proposal thus: — “ London, Nov. 1. 1821.

“ Many thanks, my dear Hill, for your note of the 27th. The papers ■ which you refer ■■■ be in better hands than yours; ■ when the proper time comes, and such ■ publication is to be made ■ ought to be made, I shall have no objection ■ their being published.

“ Ever yours most sincerely,

“ WELLINGTON.”

A great portion of these papers have since been published under the auspices of their author, by Colonel Gurwood; and ■ doubt Lord Hill had good and perhaps kind reasons, for the destruction of the documents he committed to the flames.

In the year 1824, Lord Hill lost his father, Sir John Hill, at the advanced age of 83. He ■ succeeded in his title and estates by Rowland *, eldest son of the lamented Colonel Hill. The young Sir Rowland, whose return to Parliament has been recently noticed, was prevailed upon by Mr. Canning to move the Address in the House of Commons. He was then only twenty-four years of age, and naturally felt the difficulty of such a position. How he acquitted himself we learn from ■ letter of Mr. Wilberforce written to Mrs. Hill.

“ My dear Madam,

London, Feb. 9. 1824.

“ Ever since the day of our meeting, I have had an idea of troubling you with a few lines, though ■ doubt if the weakness of my eyes and the multiplicity of my occupations, might not have made ■ delay taking up my pen till it would have become too late to do it, but for my happening to throw out to Lady Teignmouth my idea of writing, and being ■ couraged by her to carry it into execution. Being, however, extremely pressed for time, I must be both brief and hasty.

■ The present Viscount Hill.

“ But I am myself a parent; and though ■ a mother, whose feelings ■ sympathies where her children are concerned I well know ■ be far more vivid than those of ■ I ■ conscious of the pleasure it would have given me to receive such an account as with sincerity I can give to you — ■ your ■ acquitted ■ in such a way in moving the address, ■ to have produced in ■ who ■ present (all at least whose good opinion is worth having) ■ very favourable impression of his talents, ■ ■ still ■ favourable one of his moral character. I am now one of the most experienced members of the House of Commons, and I ■ truly say, that such manifest distress of feeling, I may almost ■ it, ■ he indicated, is justly regarded ■ a proof that ■ young man has both an English understanding in his head, and ■ English heart in his bosom. This very modesty may have made him send you a less favourable report of his performance than was just, and therefore I am the ■ desirous of stating to you the truth of the ■

“ That he may prove an honour to his family and ■ comfort to his mother's heart, and above all, that passing safely through the ordeal, which the world must be termed to a young man of his consideration and fortune, and that you may at length meet him in a better world, where sin and sorrow, danger and suffering, will have no place, but peace, and love, and holiness, and happiness shall abound for ever, is the cordial wish — shall I not say prayer? — of,

My dear Madam,

“ Your sincere friend,

“ W. WILBERFORCE.”

Retirement in the country was at this period particularly suited to Lord Hill, ■ he had not entirely recovered from the effects of his last illness ■ Cambray. The open air and rural pursuits ■ extremely beneficial to him. His visits to London ■ therefore few and short; but he ■ not forgotten by his friends, especially the Duke of Wellington, who ■ in frequent correspondence with him, and never failed, when occasions presented themselves, to name him for some office or honour, which his Grace knew better than any other ■■■ how ■■■ pletely he merited. The Duke had also before the death of Sir John Hill, become acquainted with that venerable parent of the gallant officers of the Peninsula and Waterloo. He went to Hawkstone expressly for the purpose, ■■ well ■■ to offer his services to the family in any way that might be in his power.

In the autumn of 1827, it ■■■ proposed ■■ Lord Hill to leave his quiet country enjoyments for the command in India.

“ ■■■■ Place, August 16. 1827.

“ My dear Lord Hill,

“ Lord Combermere has written over to the Horse Guards, expressing his desire to be relieved from his present command towards the end of next year, and applications ■■ beginning to be made by those who wish to succeed him.

“ So far ■■ my own judgment is concerned, there is no officer in whose hands I should see that command placed with ■■ much confidence and satisfaction ■■ in yours; and as, when I last mentioned the subject to you, you did not appear disinclined to accept it, I ■■ very anxious to know whether you will give ■■ leave to propose your ■■■ ■■ the present occasion. Believe me ever,

“ My dear Lord Hill, with great truth,

“ Most faithfully yours,

“ C. WILLIAMS WYNNE.

This proposal ■■■ declined by Lord Hill.

“ My dear Sir,

“ ■■■ August.

“ After ■■ absence of a fortnight in Wales, I returned home yesterday evening, and will no longer delay answering your very kind and flattering letter of the 15th.

“ In the first place, I must beg you to accept my sincere and hearty thanks for your friendly attention to me at all times, and especially on the present interesting and important occasion. The subject of your communication occupied my mind for some days, much more than the [redacted] I [redacted] engaged in the Glenclyn hills. After every consideration, I am [redacted] to a determination to decline the command in India. I am chiefly led to this conclusion from a conviction that a hot climate does not agree with my constitution, having experienced great inconvenience from [redacted] [redacted] both in the Mediterranean and in the Peninsula.

"I cannot conclude without again assuring you how much my feelings are gratified by the favourable preference you have given me on this occasion. Believe me, &c. &c.

"HILL."

The next offer made him was the Master Generalship of the Ordnance.

"My Lord,

"Downing Street, Dec. 24. 1827.

"As Lord Anglesey's assumption of the Lord-Lieutenancy of Ireland will vacate the Master-Generalship of the Ordnance, it has become my duty to recommend to his Majesty a proper person to succeed to that distinguished post. And although there are many individuals in the army eminently qualified to discharge its duties, there is no one whose name stands more prominent than your Lordship, or whom it would be more gratifying to his Majesty to confer an office of such dignity and importance.

"I have therefore received the King's commands to propose to your Lordship to succeed Lord Anglesey as Master-General of the Ordnance; and I trust I need hardly say, that although I cannot, perhaps, claim the honour of a personal acquaintance with your Lordship, I could not perform a more agreeable duty than I now do, in being in any way instrumental in showing by this offer the high sense which is entertained of your Lordship's character and services.

"It is, however, necessary that I should explain to you that it ■■■ proposed that the Master-General should, upon occasion of the present vacancy, have a seat in the Cabinet.

“ I have the honour to be, my Lord,

= Your most obedient humble servant,

= GODERICH.”

On the receipt of the above letter Lord Hill enclosed it to the Duke of Wellington, who sent him a kind ■■■■ appointing a meeting.

“ My dear Hill,

“ London, Dec. ■■■ 1827.

■ I have received your note and return the enclosure.

“ I shall be with Lord Anglesey at two, and afterwards ■ to the Horse Guards. From thence I will go and meet you at the Hanover Hotel; and I dare say I shall be with you by five, ■ ■ little after that hour.

“ Ever yours most sincerely,

“ WELLINGTON.”

The result of that conference will be ■■■ in Lord Hill's letter to the Prime Minister.

“ My Lord,

“ No. 3. Hanover Square, Dec. 29. 1827.

“ I have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your Lordship's letter of the 24th instant, addressed to ■■ at Hardwick Grange, announcing that you have received his Majesty's commands to offer me the distinguished post of Master-General of the Ordnance.

“ My feelings of gratitude for so marked a proof of his Majesty's gracious favour are, if possible, increased by the very flattering terms in which your Lordship has been pleased to address ■■ on the subject. It will probably be in your recollection that when offered the Lieutenant-Generalship of the Ordnance some years ago, by my friend the Duke of Wellington, I assigned the following ■■■■ for declining it, namely, that ■■■ never been accustomed to office duty, ■■■ ■ feared I should ■■ perform the services required of me, and that a permanent residence in town would most materially affect my health.

"As these objections still remain in full force, it would be inconsistent in me to accept an appointment of so much greater importance, the duties of which I am informed are confined to the military profession alone, but are intimately connected with the financial expenditure of the country.

"With this feeling, it only remains for me to request your Lordship will be pleased to convey my unfeigned regret in being obliged to decline his Majesty's gracious offer.

"I have the honour to be, my Lord,

"Your Lordship's obliged and faithful servant,

"HILL.

"The Viscount Goderich,
&c. &c. &c."

The health of Lord Hill was unquestionably unequal to the duties of this onerous office. When the Duke of Wellington offered him the Lieutenant-Generalship, his Grace said, "You are aware of the death of the late Lieutenant-General of the Ordnance. It will be a great pleasure to me if you will allow me to recommend you to his Majesty. I know it will be a great satisfaction to his Majesty. The office is worth about 1500*l.* per annum; but the business is constant, and I am afraid will render your residence in London necessary for the greater portion of the year, and perhaps for the whole of it." Notwithstanding this letter, the Duke was accused of offering his "intimate friend" a sinecure! So much for political antagonism.

Lord Hill received with extreme satisfaction the tidings of the appointment of the Duke of Wellington to be First Lord of the Treasury, and lost no time in sending his congratulations.

“Hardwick, Jan. 28. 1828.”

“My dear Duke of Wellington,

“Although it is needless for me to notice the extreme gratification I feel at your Grace’s being placed at the head of the Government of this country, yet I cannot resist writing two lines to offer my sincere congratulations on the important occasion; and also to state that I shall at all times be ready to attend in my place in the House of Lords, whenever my presence may be required there.

“I have the honour to remain,

“Your Grace’s ever faithful and obliged servant,

“HILL.”

The Duke’s reply gave the truth in a few words. His patriotism and not his inclination caused him to accept the office of First Minister of the Crown.

“My dear Hill,

“London, Jan. 28. 1828.

“I have received your letter, for which I am much obliged to you. I wish that I could feel any gratification in the situation to which I have been appointed.

“Ever yours most sincerely,

“W.

“The Lord Hill, G.C.B.”

This short letter was speedily followed by another, in which his Grace stated, that he had resigned his situation of Commander-in-Chief. The Duke then continued: “In consequence of my resignation I have been under the necessity of considering of an arrangement to fill the office which I have held; and I have naturally turned towards you. There is no doubt that your appointment will be highly satisfactory to the country as well as the army; but it has occurred to some of the government, that considering the place in which you stand in the list, it is better in relation to the senior officers of the army, some of whom have high pretensions, that you should be senior General upon the staff, performing the duties of Commander-in-Chief, than Commander-in-Chief. The only real difference is in the pay, which is not of much importance to you. The late Lord Anherst ■ never Commander-in-Chief, but always senior General ■ the staff. The Duke of York filled the ■ situation during the first years of his ■ mand. If this proposition should be agreeable to you, let me know by return of post, and come to town as soon ■ possible, keeping the matter secret till I shall have seen you. I need not assure you, that if you should accept this office, I will give you every assistance in my power to facilitate the performance of your duties." This letter was dated February 1. 1828; and Lord Hill decided at once to acquiesce in the flattering proposal made to him.

"Hardwick, Feb. 2. 1828.

"My dear Duke of Wellington,

"This evening's post brought ■ your Grace's important and gratifying communication of yesterday's date.

"In the first place, I must beg of you to accept my sincere and hearty thanks for your friendly attentions to me ■ all times, especially ■ the present interesting occasion. With respect to the emolument of the office, that is the last ■ consideration with me; my only object will be to perform the duties of it ■ the advantage of the country, and the good of the service. The distinguished post you have been pleased to propose to me ■ a most important situation, and being offered by your Grace to one who has served under you, is indeed most truly gratifying. All I ■ say ■ present is, that I accept the flattering ■ with pride and gratitude, and that I shall ever be my anxious study to fulfil your Grace's expectations and wishes, which I trust I shall be enabled to do by unremitting attention ■ ■■ duties, aided by the valuable assistance you have kindly promised.

" I have the honour to remain,

" Your Grace's ever faithful

" And obliged Servant,

" HILL."

With the promptitude which always marked the actions of Lord Hill, he ■■ off from Hardwick without delay, and carried his letter with him, enclosing it in a note when he reached town:—

" My dear Duke,

" Feb. 4. 3 P. M. Hanover Hotel.

" Having made my arrangements to set out for town sooner than I expected, I ■■ the bearer of my own letter, which I have now the honour to forward. I shall be happy to wait on your Grace at whatever time may be most convenient to you to receive me.

" I have, &c.

" HILL."

The Duke cordially welcomed this announcement :

" My dear Hill,

" London, Feb. ■ 1828, 9 P. M.

" I am delighted to find that you like and accept the proposal which I made to you, and that you ■■ come to town.

" I am going to Windsor to-morrow, but will see you the next day here or in Downing Street, ■■ any hour that you will call after eleven o'clock ; and I will that day settle in the Cabinet by what mode you ■■■ be appointed.

" I think you will ■■ yourself a good deal of trouble in applications, &c. by saying nothing of your appointment till I shall see you. It is not yet known what arrangement I had in contemplation.

" Ever yours most sincerely,

" WELLINGTON."

By the 15th of February every thing was settled, and Lord Hill appointed General Commanding in Chief. The Duke took his leave in the following terms:—

“GENERAL ORDER.

“ Guards, February 15.

“ The King has been most graciously pleased to direct that General Lord Hill be placed on the of Majesty's army, and that respecting his Majesty's military services, which have heretofore been transacted by the Commander-in-Chief, shall henceforth pass through the of General Lord Hill, G. C. B.

“ The King's service having imposed upon Field-Marshal the Duke of Wellington the necessity of resigning the office of Commander-in-Chief, the Field-Marshal is happy to deliver over the command to a General Officer who has so frequently promoted the honour of the army by his conduct and example; who is so well known to the officers and troops, and well acquainted with their services and merits.”

The gratification of being commended to the army in such terms, enhanced by the kind way in which the Duke sent him a copy of this order:—

“ My dear Hill,

“ London, Feb. 15.

“ I closed all my transactions, and wrote the enclosed order last night, and will give over charge to you the Horse Guards to-morrow morning eleven o'clock.

“ I have left some memoranda which will be of use to you; and I have still a paper to send you on quartering troops in Scotland; another regarding barracks I write this night, if it should be in my power.

“ I would have sent you a copy earlier if it had been printed.

“ Ever yours most sincerely,

“ WELLINGTON.”

Lord Hill's feelings on the receipt of this note were thus expressed by himself:—

" [REDACTED] Hanover Square, February 15.

" My dear Lord Duke,

" I cannot lose a moment in expressing to your Grace, the [REDACTED] satisfaction I feel [REDACTED] the very flattering [REDACTED] in which you have been pleased to mention me in your General Order of this date. I can only say it will still continue, as [REDACTED] [REDACTED] been, my study to deserve the good opinion of one to whose kindness I [REDACTED] indebted for my present proud elevation.

I [REDACTED] [REDACTED] fail [REDACTED] attend your Grace at the Horse Guards, [REDACTED] eleven o'clock to-morrow, and [REDACTED] remain,

" My dear Lord Duke, yours unfeignedly,

" HILL."

The next day Lord [REDACTED] issued his first

" GENERAL ORDER.

" [REDACTED] Guards, February 16. 1828.

" According to the King's gracious command, General Lord Hill [REDACTED] the station of General on the Staff, in order that all matters respecting his Majesty's military service, which have hitherto been transacted by the Commander-in-Chief, shall henceforth pass through his hands.

" His Lordship cannot undertake the arduous duties which devolve upon him, by this pre-eminent mark of his Majesty's favour, without expressing his confident hope that he will receive from the general and other officers, and from the public departments of the army, the zealous support calculated to enable his Lordship to [REDACTED] the important trust reposed in him, and to maintain the order, regularity, and discipline, for which the service has been distinguished under the [REDACTED] mand of his Royal Highness the late Duke of York, and his Grace the Duke of Wellington.

" His Lordship is convinced that he shall best perform his duty to the King, his country, and to the army itself, by endeavouring [REDACTED] follow the high example afforded by these, [REDACTED] illustrious predecessors."

Lord Hill took possession of the Horse Guards without any ostentation ; and the transaction of delicate and important duties was marked by equal clemency and justice. Officers' widows received from him the kindest attention ; but not unfrequently the length and urgency of their claims were quite embarrassing. On being asked how he managed to prevent their taking up more time than he could spare, he replied, smiling, " Why, in the room where I receive them, there is only one chair ; I ask them to sit down ; then they are sorry to remain standing, so they do not stay very long."

He continued Lord Fitzroy Somerset in the situation of Military Secretary, and received from that able and distinguished officer assistance that may be justly designated invaluable, and regarded both his own comfort and the interests of the service.

Lord Hill, when he came to reside in London, took every opportunity of manifesting his regard for his venerable uncle, Mr. Rowland Hill. Some of his congregation thinking this a golden opportunity, used to pester the good old gentleman to make all sorts of applications to his nephew. One day, when Lord Hill called at Surrey Chapel House, his uncle said to him, " I tell you what I wish you would do ; if you could scold, do write me a good scolding letter about these botherations, which I may show, and then, perhaps, I shall get rid of them." The scolding letter, however, never came, and the applications still continued to pour in. Indeed there was scarcely a place in which Mr. Rowland Hill preached, where parents did not discover dormant military genius in their other of their sons, whom ■■■ desired to bring under the notice of the Commander of the Forces.

In the autumn of his first year of service ■ the Horse Guards Lord ■■ suffered in health, and ■■■ obliged to leave town for a time. This appears from ■ letter addressed to him by his late Majesty King George the Fourth, which contained this gracious sentence: — “ I ■■■ sincerely sorry to hear that you had left town out of health, and I do most truly hope that you have already derived benefit from your change of ■■■ and climate.” Country air effected his restoration, and he was ■■■ well enough to write to the King — “ I am deeply sensible of your Majesty’s kindness in condescending to inquire after my health, and I ■■■ happy to be able to inform your Majesty, with my most grateful acknowledgments, that I am now perfectly recovered.”

One of the greatest pleasures Lord Hill experienced, in his elevated situation, was the power it conferred ■ him of manifesting his regard for his old and attached friend Lord Lynedoch, to whom he wrote the following kind letter:—

“ Private.

“ ■■■ Guards, May ■■ 1829.

“ My dear Lord Lynedoch,

“ I ■■■ forward the official notification of your appointment ■ the government of Dunbarton Castle, without ■ the same time assuring you that I have ■■■ in my life had the opportunity of conferring a favour which has ■■■ me more sincere satisfaction; and I am sensible you will ■■ gratified by learning that my nomination has met with the cordial approbation of ■ Majesty.

“ Believe me to ■ ever faithfully yours,

“ HILL.”

On his accession to the throne, William the Fourth manifested towards Lord Hill the greatest possible confidence and favour. [REDACTED] had a very early interview with his Majesty, who, after many expressions of regard, said, "I hope you [REDACTED] long continue to command my army." On the change of ministry, Sir Herbert Taylor was commissioned to convey a most gracious message to Lord Hill, which, with his characteristic prudence, he requested to have in writing. In compliance with this wish, the subjoined letter was immediately written:—

"My dear Lord,                      "St. James's Palace, Nov. 20. 1830.

"Your Lordship having expressed a desire to receive in writing the communication which, in obedience to the King's commands, I [REDACTED] the honour to make to you verbally yesterday, I will [REDACTED] delay giving effect to your wish.

"[REDACTED] Majesty charged me to wait upon your Lordship, and to acquaint you that he [REDACTED] determined to confer upon you the command of the Royal Horse Guards, and the Gold Stick, vacant by the resignation of his Royal Highness the Duke of Cumberland—[REDACTED] time since received; that his Majesty availed himself with great pleasure of this opportunity of marking, by his spontaneous act, the high [REDACTED] which he entertains of the able, zealous, and correct manner in which your Lordship has discharged the important duties attached to the chief command of his army, and of manifesting to the army and the country his personal regard and [REDACTED] for your character, as well as his approbation of your conduct during your meritorious and exemplary [REDACTED]. His Majesty has felt desirous upon this occasion to do justice to [REDACTED] care and attention which have enabled your Lordship to maintain that high character for discipline and good conduct, which the [REDACTED] army has acquired under [REDACTED] fostering care of his late lamented brother the Duke of York, and under [REDACTED] distinguished command of [REDACTED] Duke of Wellington; and his Majesty feels convinced that this mark of his approbation will be received with satisfaction by that army, and will prove gratifying, as he is desirous it should, to the feelings of the Duke of Wellington, who had so often acknowledged the value of your services in the field, [REDACTED] who [REDACTED] recommended you to the late king for the chief command when he resigned it.

“ The King wished your Lordship clearly [REDACTED] understand that [REDACTED] [REDACTED] his desire, nor [REDACTED] intention, that [REDACTED] mark of [REDACTED] approbation, and of his personal regard, [REDACTED] influence [REDACTED] line of conduct you might feel called upon to pursue in consequence of the change which has taken place in [REDACTED] councils; but his Majesty charged me to say that the sentiments he had expressed, would naturally render him anxious [REDACTED] to be deprived of the benefit of your continued services in the command of the army, which, indeed, he had never felt disposed to view in the light of a political situation. His Majesty had, however, when he called upon Lord Grey to form [REDACTED] administration, placed every arrangement at his discretion, and left every situation at his disposal, as his Majesty felt that the circumstances under which so arduous [REDACTED] task [REDACTED] imposed upon his Lordship called for the utmost support which his Majesty could give to him, and for every facility which could be afforded. His Majesty, therefore, received with peculiar satisfaction the assurance of Lord Grey's earnest desire that your Lordship might be prevailed upon to retain the command of the army, and his request that his Majesty would cause that wish to be conveyed to you.

“ By your Lordship's removal to the Royal Horse Guards, the command of the 53d regiment would become vacant, [REDACTED] the King ordered me to [REDACTED] [REDACTED] you his desire that you would recommend for it Major-General Lord Fitzroy Somerset, who has, [REDACTED] [REDACTED] Majesty's opinion, by his gallant and distinguished service in the field, and by his able, assiduous, [REDACTED] exemplary discharge of the arduous [REDACTED] of military secretary, so well [REDACTED] [REDACTED] of [REDACTED] Majesty's favour [REDACTED] approbation. His Majesty is aware that his attention would ere [REDACTED] have been called to Lord Fitzroy Somerset's just claim to this reward, if his Lordship himself desired that he might not be advanced; but he is convinced that it will not be considered by the army and by the public to have been too early conferred; the event of your Lordship continuing in the command of the army, his Majesty hoped and trusted that Lord Fitzroy Somerset would not feel unwilling to give the further advantage of his valuable services. In this instance, too, his Majesty has rejoiced in doing that which is satisfactory to the feelings of the Duke of Wellington.

“ I have, &c.

“ H. TAYLOR.

“ General the Lord Hill, G. C. B.
&c. &c. &c.”

The sentiments expressed by the King towards Lord Hill, showed his Majesty's just estimate of his integrity and value. Lord Hill, for the benefit of his health, took a house at Westbourne. Soon after the King said to him, “ I do not dine with any body in London, you know; but you do not live in London, and I shall come and dine with you.” The party, besides his Majesty, consisted of the Duke of Wellington, the Duke of Gordon, Lord Rosslyn, Lord Cathcart, Lord E. Somerset, Lord Fitzroy Somerset, Lord Melville, Lord Combermere, Sir Robert Peel, Sir George Murray, Sir Willoughby Gordon, Sir Herbert Taylor, Sir Henry Hardinge, Colonel Macdonald, Major-General Macdonald, and the aids-de-camp. His Majesty came without any state, and appeared thoroughly to enjoy himself.

The scrutinising of Lord Hill's political opponents could not detect a flaw in his administration, though they strained hard to find one. He was, in the presence of his sovereign and in his room

■ the Horse Guards, the same straightforward man. In ■■■ memoranda there ■ the following ■■■ of an audience with the King, which proves the truth of ■■■ assertion, and is most honourable ■ his Lordship's royal master: — " In consequence of a letter in ■ King's ■■ hand this day respecting ———, I saw his Majesty, who said he ■■ positively decided that ——— should be ———, upon which I remarked that if such ■■■ his Majesty's commands they should be obeyed; but, ■■ commanding the army, I felt it my duty to say that it would create great dissatisfaction, and that I entreated his Majesty to consider the subject well before he came to such ■ final conclusion. The King very kindly said it was my duty to point out to him ■■■ objections on the present occasion. He would not press the question." Lord Hill went directly to the officer alluded to, related the whole affair, and added, " I ■■■■ you it was all my doing."

While Lord Hill resided at Westbourne House, he united, ■■ much ■■ possible, the enjoyments of the country with the business of his command. His ■■ ciety, always much courted, ■■■ exceedingly enjoyed by those with whom he could cast off his natural ■■ serve, and give vent to the flow of his quiet and agreeable humour. He ■■■ most good-natured to his Paddington neighbours, and ready to please every body when he could. One day, to gratify an officer he had known in the Peninsula, he actually allowed ■■ own carriage to be attached ■■ a steam coach, in which his gallant acquaintance took ■■ great interest. Unluckily, however, ■■ engineer made too ■■■ a turn round a corner, and the carriage and its contents were hurled into a hedge in a field. Luckily, Lordship and companions escaped injury, and the newspapers never heard of the accident. I recollect telling the story in a private circle. He was asked how he could run such a risk. "O," said he, "I did it to please ———; he was a brave fellow. Once in the Peninsular war, an officer who led a charge was shot and his horse killed back. I desired ——— to mount it, and take his place. 'Bless you,' he cried, 'I will ride.' 'Never mind,' I replied, 'jump up!' and I never witnessed a more gallant affair. On seeing ——— afterwards, I asked him how he got on well, being such a novice at horsemanship. 'O,' said he, 'I shut my eyes, and galloped on, and cried, Old England for ever!'"

His good-humoured way of taking every thing will be seen in a note he sent to the Lord Mayor and Lady Mayoress, on their inviting Lord and Lady Hill to a banquet at the Mansion House: — "Lord Hill presents his compliments to the Lord Mayor and the Lady Mayoress, and begs to acquaint them that as he has not the good fortune to be married, he cannot have the honour of presenting Lady Hill at the Mansion House on Thursday, the 20th instant. Horse Guards, 15th January, 1831."

We have now followed the career of Lord Hill from the early period when he first chose the army as his profession, to the time when his splendid services placed him at its head.

There appeared in him throughout the same unaffected disposition that graced his boyhood. The enchantments of fame, ■■ felicitous providences of a ■■■■■ career, the difference of age, the ■■■■■ of the court, the exaltation of position, actual power, altered him not : ■■ ■■ ■■ ear that neither the trumpet of acclamation nor the echoings of honour could deafen ■■ the gentle whispers of kindness ; ■■■ the ■■■ unassuming mien that made his obedience grateful to ■■ superiors, became even more a charm when it ■■■ perceived to be the adornment of authority and place.

CHAPTER XIII.

PRIVATE THOUGHTS OF LORD HILL. — DINNERS AT LORD HILL'S MOUTH'S ON THE ESTABLISHMENT OF THE REGIMENT — LORD HILL'S OPINIONS WITH REGARD TO THE REGIMENT BILL. — LETTER TO THE HONORABLE HILL. — CONVERSATION WITH THE KING. — THE "CROWN" WON AND UNIFORM OF THE REGIMENT III. — FÊTE AT WESTBOURNE HOUSE. — DEATH OF SIR JOHN HILL. — LORD HILL'S ATTENTION TO HIS DUTY. — DEATH OF THE REV. HOWLAND HILL. — LORD HILL ATTENDS THE FUNERAL. — INSTANCES OF LORD HILL'S PRUDENCE AND FIRMNESS. — CARRIES THE BANNER AT THE FUNERAL OF THE KING IV. — QUEEN ADLAIDE. — HIS FIRST AUDIENCE WITH HER MAJESTY. — LORD HILL AND THE DUKE OF SOULT. — CANADA. — THE DUKE OF WELLINGTON'S LOVE OF TRUTH. — LORD HILL AND THE DUKE OF WELLINGTON. — LORD HILL AND THE DUKE OF WELLINGTON. — LORD HILL ON THE WINDING UP OF THE REGIMENT. — THE MOTIVES OF ACTION.

LORD HILL had the advantage, in early life, of instruction in religious truth from several eminently pious members of his family; and their precepts, as well as their example, left an indelible impression on his mind. He said little in society on this or on most other subjects; but in secret he had many deep and serious reflections. The great uprightness of his conduct, was the result of an earnest desire to have his conscience void of offence before God and man. After his decease, a paper of notes was found in his drawer, which, intended as it was for his own eye alone, was a remarkable evidence of the spirit in which he fulfilled the duties of his distinguished office. A from his record of his private thoughts will suffice to show in what current they flowed:—

"Since God has thus raised me, it certainly be for some wise and good end—to do my duty in this state of life
 I am called."

"Cannot God, who raised me without myself—cannot He raise me or keep me up, though my ruin should be designed and attempted? And perhaps it may never come to this; for who knows but God may give a blessing to my honest endeavours? Now if I neglect that which I take to be my duty, for fear of danger or any consideration put it off, I may justly expect . . . ."

"I know that I have not the least pretence to what I enjoy. I am His debtor, and can make no other return but by doing my duty honestly, and leaving the event to Providence."

"May my weak and cowardly apprehension fright me from my duty. Inspire me with zeal and courage becoming my profession. Make me to do some good in this station in which is my present lot. (From Wilson.)"

"A soft answer turneth away wrath; but grievous words stir up anger."*

"The Lord gave, and the Lord taketh away; blessed be the name of the Lord."

"What, shall we receive good at the hand of God, and shall we receive evil?"

"My heart shall not reproach me. For there is a part to act: I go to perform it. My duty I do to-day."

"Animated by a good conscience and rectitude of intention, the feeble have become strong. It consists in being deterred by no danger when duty calls; in fulfilling our allotted part with bravery and constancy of mind."

* This passage (Proverbs, xv.1.) of it pervaded his correspond-was written in the fly-leaf of his Book, and the spirit

"Be strong and of good courage; fear not, nor be afraid of them: for the Lord thy God, He ■ ■ that doth go with thee. He will not fail thee, nor forsake thee: and the Lord, He it is that doth go before thee. He will not fail thee, neither forsake thee; fear not, neither be dismayed."

"Fret not thyself, else shalt thou be moved to do evil."

These passages show that he ■■■ a reader of the Bible, and that he desired to regulate his conduct according to its rules. He generally dined with Lord Teignmouth, the President of the Bible Society, on the day of its anniversary, and seemed to listen with interest to the conversation of the good men who formed the parties on these occasions. What he heard he treasured up in his own bosom, and it pleased God, when sickness incapacitated him for all public duty, to make the Word of Eternal Truth his joy and consolation.

The position of affairs at the period of the Reform Bill greatly tried him. No slight honour is due to his memory from his own political party, for the way in which he maintained his independence in office at that time. Not only did he remain firm under the difficulties of being opposed to the Government, but ■■■ unmoved by the intimation of the King himself, his kind and indulgent master, that his Majesty wished him to vote for the Bill. "Sir H. T.," he says in his memoranda, "communicated to me H. M.'s wish that I should vote for the second reading of the Reform Bill. I gave no reply; but said I would consider the subject." His decision, and the view he took of his line of duty, ■■■ thus expressed in a letter to his nephew, Sir Rowland Hill:—

" Dear Rowland, " Home Guards, October 8. 1831.

" You will see by the papers that the Reform Bill has been thrown out on the second reading in the House of Lords, by a majority of forty-one. It is very possible you may be asked what part I have taken on the occasion; and to enable you to answer such inquiries, I think it right to acquaint you that I had deemed it best to take no part in the question.

" When the present Administration came into office, I was appointed by his Majesty, who was graciously pleased to express a wish that I should continue in a command, which he gave me the honour to say I had conducted so much to his satisfaction and the advantage of the country. His Majesty at the same time observed that he did not consider the situation a political one, and that I was not bound to support any measure of the Government which I might not entirely approve of. This on the part of the King justified me in considering myself free to act in whatever way I might think proper; but bearing in mind the importance of the command confided to me, and the fact that the Reform Bill was introduced into Parliament under the sanction of his Majesty, I felt that I should best discharge my duty to his Majesty and to the public by refraining from taking any part in the measure under consideration. I therefore abstained from going to the House; and having always been of opinion that the less the army interferes in politics the better, particularly in these times, I do not regret the course I pursued; and, indeed, am rather glad that this question has given me the opportunity of setting it the example.

" It may be satisfactory to you to know, that the course I have pursued it my duty to follow, and met with the cordial approbation of those whose good opinion it has been my ambition to deserve.

" Believe me to be, dear Rowland,

" Very affectionately yours,

" HILL.

" Rowland Hill, Bart., M.P."

When the Bill was again brought forward in the House of Lords, the following conversation took place between his Majesty and Lord Sandhurst. I give it from his Lordship's notes:—“The King sent me a note desiring my attendance at the Palace. His Majesty, after speaking on the subject of the College*, said, ‘The discussion on the Reform Bill was about to be again brought forward in the House of Lords, and that he could not but wish that it should go into Committee, which would show the country that the Lords were not averse to some reform, and might make alterations when in committee.’ In consequence of what Sir H. Taylor said to me on this subject about a fortnight ago, and from the manner in which the King spoke to me, I felt that he expected me to state my sentiments and intentions. I therefore told his Majesty, that on the last occasion I had acted in a way which I understood was satisfactory to him, namely, by not voting at all; that I still entertained the same objection to the Bill, and that according to my present feelings I could not vote for the second reading of the Bill, when it was brought forward again. Such, he assured his Majesty, were my conscientious feelings; and I added, that if I were to act contrary to them and to my known declarations, I should so lower myself in the eyes of the world and the army, that I should not be able to render service to his Majesty or the country. The King said he could understand my feelings, and that every one had a right to have his own: he had his. His Majesty appeared kind and not angry, but perhaps * Sandhurst, I believe.

was not pleased. On my saying that I wished I had not a Parliament as long as I was at the head of the army, he replied, 'But as you have one, you cannot give it up, you must attend it,' or something to that effect. The King spoke on the state of the country, and the expected disturbances, and his indignation at the spirit of the people."

In all his interviews with the King, Lord Hill acted in the most independent and upright manner, and His Majesty's most honest mind approved and valued his integrity. To show him that the conversation just quoted had made no unkind impression on his feelings, the King very shortly afterwards presented him with a sword, as a token of his personal regard. At St. James's Palace and at Windsor his Majesty invariably paid him the most marked attention; well knowing that of all his subjects not one was more sincerely devoted to his person. After Lord Hill's death, a silk purse belonging to him was found to contain a small piece, in an envelope of writing-paper. On the paper was written, "This Crown was won by Lord Hill from his Majesty King William the Fourth, at Windsor Castle, 25th Oct., 1831. I will do my best to preserve it for Him. H." He was a frequent guest at the royal table, both at Windsor and in London, and his brother, Colonel Clement Hill, the popular Lieutenant-Colonel of the Blues, of Lordship's regiment. The King gave Colonel a suit of uniform of his regiment worn by George the Third, and the sculptor modelled from it the dress of the statue of that monarch in Pall Mall East. It is preserved with due care in a glass case at Hawkestone, and is not only an interesting specimen of the uniform of the Third Regiment (Blue) in bygone days, was a valuable relic of one of the most estimable monarchs that ever swayed the sceptre of this free and prosperous nation. While Lord Hill lived at Westbourne House, Paddington, the King and Queen engaged to honour him with their company at a public breakfast. Unhappily his Majesty was prevented attending by a cold; but the Queen came, in the kindest manner, to the party, which was given with much splendour.

In the beginning of 1832, Lord Hill lost his brother, Sir Thomas Noel Hill. He died at Maidstone on the 8th of January, while Lord Hill was at Hardwick Grange. His Lordship hastened to the scene of mourning, and afforded her the consolation in his power to his brother's widow, whose grief was also soothed by the presence of her excellent father, the late Lord Teignmouth. On his return to town Lord Hill wrote to his venerable uncle, Mr. Rowland Hill, with his customary kindness:—

"My dear Uncle,

"Horse Guards, Jan. 17. 1832.

"I returned from Maidstone last night, after performing the last rites on my poor brother's remains. It was a melancholy gratification to observe the genuine and regret of all ranks at Maidstone. The shops were shut, and every possible respect paid that could be. Lady Hill, though in a very distressed state of mind, has been moved up to town, but time must be allowed for her grief to subside. I shall be happy to see you any morning at Westbourne; or, if it is agreeable to you at this season of the year, I can, without any inconvenience, be at your house.

"I am, my dear Uncle,

"Very truly yours,

"Rev. Rowland Hill."

"Hill."

In the many letters of condolence received by Lord Hill, uniform testimony was given to the high in which Sir Noel was held.

Engaged in his Lordship was in the duties attached to his office, home and native county were still the objects of his constant solicitude. He was extremely fond of his farm at Hardwick, which he stocked with the choicest animals he could procure, not only for his own gratification, but with a view to improve the breed in his neighbourhood. Nothing seemed to be forgotten by him. Happening to a spring carriage, adapted for the conveyance of sufferers from fractures and other accidents, he immediately purchased it, and sent it to the Infirmary at Shrewsbury. At the Horse Guards, merit the only sure introduction to his favour; and he sought it in the soldier of every rank. He used to tell an amusing story of one case:—A geant had long given such high satisfaction that he thought him deserving of a commission, and promoted him. All the officers of the regiment called to congratulate him on his good fortune, and treated him with the utmost courtesy. He presented himself at the levee of the Commander-in-Chief, to return thanks. He a Scotchman, and lest he should be offended by the mention of his name, we will call him Macbride. Lord Hill welcomed him with an encouraging smile, and began, "Well, Macbride, I am glad to see you. I hear all the officers have called on you. How do you get on in your new character? You are a gentleman now, you know." "Thank you, my Lord," replied the worthy soldier; "for myself I perfectly comfortable, but I trembles for Mrs Macbride."

In April, 1833, Lord Hill lost his uncle, the Rev. Rowland Hill, who died at Surrey Chapel House, in the eighty-ninth year of his age. He was, for between sixty and seventy years of his life, a most laborious minister of the Gospel; and such was the extent of his exertions, that there is scarcely a town of any magnitude in the kingdom, where some of the inhabitants do not cherish a recollection of his appearance amongst them as a preacher. Early in life he was persecuted at college, frowned upon at home, and often abused and pelted by the populace; but all these obstructions gradually gave way before the dignity of his character; so that in the end of his days he became a most striking instance of the fulfilment of the Divine promise, "Those that honour me, I will honour." He was eminently useful during a period of prevalent neglect of "the one thing needful." There were many who, though they mourned over the apathy of a thoughtless and licentious age equally with himself, could not approve his erratic course, yet few ventured to condemn it, because the fact was unquestionable, that "he was a good man, and full of the Holy Ghost, and much people were added to the Lord." Sincerely attached to his distinguished nephew, he regarded his elevation with a warm and affectionate interest, which was constantly rewarded by the most delicate attentions on the part of Lord Hill. His Lordship's first dinner after he became Commander-in-Chief was given to his uncle, and he did not lose any opportunity of adding to his comforts of his declining days. His funeral took place at Surrey Chapel on the 19th of April; and although Lord Hill had been commanded to attend the King on that day, he begged His Majesty's gracious permission to be excused, that he might be present on the solemn occasion. When the service ended, he observed to step forward, and look into the grave. A tear glistened in his eye, and he turned away with emotion.

Lord Hill had for many years great business to contend with in the situation he filled, but he steered through them all with a temper unruffled, and a honour unimpeached. On the 27th of June, 1835, he made a memorandum to this effect:—"Saw Lord ——. He said the Government was desirous of giving every encouragement to the Spanish levy: I told him I would not check it, but I would not encourage officers to come forward. Officers on full pay could not go; but they might retire on half pay if they chose it, taking their chance with others to be brought on full pay hereafter. I repeated this to the King, who approved." This is an instance of his maintaining the views he thought advisable for the army, without placing any party obstacle in the way of a Government whose proceedings were not according to his own opinions. Not an iota of the dignity or privileges of his station would he ever give up. In September, 1836, he heard, while at Hardwick, that certain orders had been issued without His Majesty's sanction. He instantly went up to town. His note on the business to the King, whence this fact was derived:—"14th Sept., 1836. Came to town to see His Majesty King on the subject of orders issued without my knowledge. The interview was, upon the whole, satisfactory; and I am inclined to think nothing similar will in future occur." These instances prove what was the real character of Lord Hill as to wisdom, prudence, and firmness in his high command. It is not, however, expedient to enlarge on such topics. In vindicating his exalted character it is not necessary to be personal, nor to unveil those things which ought to be considered confidential;—a recklessness deeply to be lamented in any biographer, and most unsuitable to the gentle, unoffending subject of these pages.

Lord Hill lost in William the Fourth a kind master and a faithful friend. He bore the banner in the sad pageant of the royal funeral, with a trembling hand; and it is still kept at Hawkstone in remembrance of the day when he paid this last tribute of duty and respect to the memory of a monarch, who had honoured him with support and friendship. His Majesty never omitted an opportunity of showing the interest he took in all which concerned him. On the birth of the present heir of Hawkstone, Sir Herbert Taylor wrote to Lord Hill,—“His Majesty has ordered me to congratulate you and all of the name, upon the birth of a son and heir to Sir Rowland Hill, and to assure you of the pleasure with which he has learned that Lady Hill and the child are doing well.” Her Majesty Queen Adelaide entertained the same sentiments in the King towards Lord Hill; and on the birth of the second son of Sir Rowland and Lady Hill, Lord Howe was thus commanded to congratulate him:—

" My dear Lord Hill, " Windsor Castle, Friday.

" Our good Queen, although on her sick couch, is not unmindful of any thing which is a subject of pleasure to you and yours.

" Her Majesty has seen an account of Lady Hill's confinement, and commands me to convey her Majesty's sincere congratulations on the event both to Sir Rowland and yourself, and trusts the mother and babe are both going on as well as you could wish.

" Ever, my dear Lord Hill,

" Most truly yours,

" HOWE."

Lord Hill was much affected by this proof of her Majesty's esteem, and said in reply,— " I know of no circumstance in the whole of my life which has afforded me the same gratification, as that I have derived from the marked and constant kindness of her Majesty; and I am particularly sensible of this last instance of it, as it has been shown me at a moment when her Majesty is herself suffering under sickness, and could hardly have been expected to give a thought to matters relating to what might interest me."

On the accession of our present gracious Sovereign, Lord Hill was received with the same confidence that he had enjoyed during the two preceding reigns. He attended his first audience of her Majesty at St. James's Palace on June 21st, 1837, and took the royal pleasure for the mourning consequent on the decease of the late King. Shortly after he submitted proceedings of courts-martial to the Queen at Kensington Palace, and thus enjoyed the happiness of serving her Majesty with acceptance to the end of his public life.

At the coronation of Queen Victoria, Lord Hill saw many of his former companions in arms, and those who had been opposed to him, whom he had never met before except in the field of battle. The chief amongst the latter was Marshal Soult. They were introduced to each other, for the first time, at a party at Buckingham Palace. The story which is current at the time, of Soult's having addressed him with "Je te rencontre enfin, moi qui ai parcouru si longtemps après vous," had its origin in the imagination of the inventors; for when their being presented to each other, little more passed than formal bows on either side. But when the Marshal fully comprehended the cordiality of his reception in England, all coolness subsided, and the most gratifying intercourse took place.

The state of Canada, and the necessity of sending troops there, occupied a good deal of Lord Hill's attention. He wrote as follows to his nephew:—

" Horse Guards, Saturday evening, 8 o'clock.

" Dear Rowland, (No date.)

" We have no official accounts from Canada, and I believe none have reached this country. There are, however, rumours of unpleasant arrivals.

" If you have read the debates in the Lords on the Canada question, you will be amused with Lord Brougham's speech; he is uncommonly bitter on our old friends, the Government. The Duke of Wellington spoke, as he always does, straightforward, and the truth; stating that military men had given their opinion that no more troops were required in Canada, at the time the Government was accused of not sending them. This is a saving clause for the Ministers, and they are grateful for it. The Duke's principle is, never to say any thing he does not believe he true, and also to act for the good of the country, to the best of ■■■ judgment, whether ■■■ ■■■ ■■■ “ Am going to dine with Lord Maryborough.

“ Yours ever,

“ H.

“ P. S. I do not think there is any truth in the reports of arrivals from Canada. I have just heard so from the Colonial Office.”

This testimony to the Duke, from one who knew him ■ well, only confirms what the whole world ■ long seen, admired, and rewarded with unbounded honour and confidence. Let the votaries of policy learn from it the power of truth.

Lord Hill used to amuse himself, after the fatigues of business, with writing to Sir Rowland on the leading topics of the day:—

“ Home Guards, Nov. 27. (No date.)

“ Dear Rowland,

“ These easterly winds prevent all arrivals. Even the great man from Canada ■■■ work his way through them. Cabinet Councils sit daily, but up to this hour I have heard nothing of an increase of force—a measure which, in my mind, ought ■■■ be delayed. I ■■■ thought of leaving town the end of this week, but, upon consideration, I think ■ will be better to remain here so long as the Ministers are together; for perhaps they may ■ upon something which may require my attention. There ■■■ who think the breach between Lord Durham ■■■ the Government so great that they can never act together; but possibly you are right in your observations on that subject. The Duke of Wellington is going to Bath: he ■■■ suffers from, I believe, a contraction of the muscles of the neck. I have told Sir R. Peel I will pay him a visit, on the 26th December, for a few days.

“ Yours very affectionately,

“ HILL.”

When the riots took place in Monmouthshire Lord Hill was ■ ■ visit at Powis Castle. On his way ■ town he was informed of these unhappy occurrences. ■ gave ■ following account of the gallantry of a small band of soldiers, in one of his letters to ■ nephew: — “At Shrewsbury I received the accounts of the very serious disturbances in Monmouthshire, ■ you will see by the papers. On my arrival in town I found ■ very interesting particulars, which ■ highly creditable to the ■ military force ■ there, viz. ■ captain, one lieutenant, ■ ensigu, three sergeants, and fifty-six privates. It appears that the day before the attack, information ■ received that the Chartists ■ collecting several thousands in the neighbourhood. The extraordinary circumstance is, that these arrangements on the part of the Chartists were so secret, that ■ of the magistrates or authorities were the least aware of what was going on. At daybreak the mayor sent for ■ many troops as could be spared without risking the position of the barracks. Twenty-eight ■ and two sergeants, under Lieutenant Gray, ■ stationed in a house, and ■ attacked by at least four thousand. The attack made ■ effectually resisted by these few men of the forty-fifth. Lieutenant Gray's conduct was admirable. Lord Normanby tells me he saved the town.* The object of the Chartists ■ to overpower this ■ force, and then proceed to Monmouth ■ release ■ prisoners.”

Lord ■ chief relaxations ■ visits to Hardwick Grange and Hawkstone. Occasionally he went to Woburn, ■ Belvoir Castle, and to Drayton Manor, for ■ day ■ two of shooting; but he ■ seldom ab- ■ long together from the Horse Guards. ■ took a great interest in many of the ingenious inventions of science, particularly the electric telegraph, and the application of the galvanic battery to the blowing up of the Royal George. I well remember his astonishment, after firing ■ of the smaller charges, ■ the instantaneous explosion. Colonel Pasley kindly sent him some of the articles recovered from the wreck. The parcel itself is thus described by the Colonel in his letter:—"It contains a pistol recovered from the wreck of the Royal George, with part of ■ silver buckle, each as it ■ found by the diver. All the iron work of the pistol is gone. Brass is not injured, and copper very little, but iron is destroyed, in time, by salt-water. Glass is injured, but china escapes perfect. I enclose in the same parcel some flints, also from the Royal George, on which salt-water produces no perceptible effect."

* Newport.

During the shrievalty of Mr. Wheelton, Lord Hill ■ informed by him, at one of the city entertainments, that the widow of his former tutor, Mrs. Winfield, ■ residing in the suburbs of London. Mr. Wheelton ■ connected with her by marriage, and Lord Hill appointed ■ day for accompanying him to her residence. The meeting was touching in the extreme; and the kindness manifested by Lord Hill will never be erased from the remembrance of her family. He paid her frequent visits, ■ her presents of game, and, by every attention in his power, manifested that years and honours had not, in any degree, diminished [REDACTED] gratitude for her [REDACTED] of [REDACTED] [REDACTED] he entered on a soldier's life. His disposition to [REDACTED] pleasure to those he esteemed, appeared in the most minute circumstances. In his letters to [REDACTED] friends in Shropshire, he mentioned [REDACTED] that he thought would interest them; as, for example, to Sir Rowland, "I dined at Buckingham Palace yesterday. Her Majesty inquired after you." After the fire at the Tower, he wrote, "I went to the spot [REDACTED] [REDACTED] I heard of the event, and [REDACTED] my return I reported to Prince Albert, for the Queen's information, that her Majesty's crown jewels were safe." Nor was this the only fire where Lord Hill [REDACTED] [REDACTED] the spot, rendering efficient service. At the dreadful scene of conflagration, when the two Houses of Parliament [REDACTED] burnt, he [REDACTED] present; and to his coolness in advising the division of the rafters of the ignited roof, and thus cutting off the continuity of the flame, the country owes the preservation of Westminster Hall.

His adviser and friend [REDACTED] all particular occasions was the Duke of Wellington, who said to him, after one of his confidential complaints of annoyances, "Never mind, Hill; you have enough to satisfy your conscience. Every body knows the army under your charge has saved the country." Such words from those truthful lips made him [REDACTED] than amends for all he [REDACTED] called upon to bear. They form the last memorandum but [REDACTED] he made in his note-book of special circumstances. The last was just before the government of the Whigs terminated:—"Saw [REDACTED] in bed. Stated to him the mischief and danger of the Government press, in its attacks on those in authority in the army."

He thus expressed himself on the tenacity with which the Whigs clung to office, in one of his letters to Sir Rowland:—"The general impression amongst well-informed people is astonishment that the Government still continue to hold office, after what passed in the Commons the other night. They do, however, seem to be determined to keep their situations as long as they can. I have never heard a word from _____ on the subject I alluded to some weeks ago, and therefore conclude, he does not feel himself and party strong enough to meddle with the Horse Guards." All the Commander-in-Chief's private friends knew how much he was to bear; but the determination to persevere in what he believed to be the path of honour and duty, cheered and supported him.

CHAPTER XIV.

STATE OF THE HEALTH OF LORD HILL. — GOES TO RICHMOND, AND CALLS ON THE QUEEN. — VISITS THE QUEEN AT TAKES A VILLA AT FULHAM. — AT RICHMOND RECEIVES THE VISIT OF THE KING OF PRUSSIA. — VISITS THE QUEEN AT ABILITY OF THE QUEEN AT WINDSOR. — DEATH OF SIR FRANCIS HILL. — LORD HILL'S VISIT TO THE QUEEN AT WINDSOR WITH THE QUEEN TO SUSSEX. — COLKILL. — DETERMINES TO GO TO THE QUEEN OF WELLINGTON. — LETTER OF THE QUEEN TO HIS MAJESTY. — THE QUEEN'S ANSWER
 ANSWER OF LORD HILL. — LEAVES THE QUEEN'S GUARDS.
 ORDER. — COLONEL EGESTON. — SECRETARIES AT THE QUEEN'S HOUSE. LORD HILL'S LETTER TO SIR ROBERT HARDINGE. — GENERAL STATE OF THE QUEEN OF WELLINGTON. — LORD HILL MADE A VISCOUNT. — HIS LETTER TO THE QUEEN. — HIS LETTER TO GENERAL EGESTON. — LORD HILL'S LAST ILLNESS. — HIS DEVOTION AND HIS DEATH. — CONDOLENCES. — FUNERAL. — DEATH OF THE QUEEN.
 — HER CHARACTER. — SIR ROBERT HILL AND GENERAL CLEMENT HILL. — REMARKS.

WHEN the government of Sir Robert Peel came into power, they could not fail to be gratified by finding Lord Hill at the head of the army. The uniform kindness of her Majesty, added to the pleasure of seeing in office whose views were similar to his own, stimulated him to continue his labours at the Horse Guards, when his declining strength might have otherwise induced him to retire. He became a good deal oppressed at times by close attention to business, and sought refreshment from visits to places near London, or at Brighton, where he was often induced to go by the advice of his attached physician Dr. Hair. The Duke of Somerset kindly invited him to spend a short time at his Grace's villa, near Richmond. While there, he determined one morning to call on Lord Sidmouth, whose last days were spent at Richmond Park. When he arrived, the servant said Lord Sidmouth did not receive company; but on Lord Hill's desiring that his name should be sent in, the remarkable statesman gave immediate directions for his admittance. The meeting was most cordial. Lord Sidmouth fully appreciated the compliment paid him; and Lord Hill was delighted to find that his aged friend bore the weight of more than eighty years with a mind and memory unimpaired. They soon commenced an animated conversation on times long past, and on the prospects of the country. Lord Sidmouth told his anecdotes in his most happy manner. He sat at a small table; and on allusion being made to the war, he said, "Lord Nelson was with me at this table in September, 1805, before he went out to meet the combined fleets of France and Spain, which he expected he should fall in with. He drew out his plan upon it *; and his words were, 'I shall attack in two lines, led by myself and Collingwood, and I am confident I shall capture either their front and centre, or their centre and rear.' Such were his very words — wonderfully confirmed as we all know." These two

* An inscription, which Lord Hill; but I have thought Lord Sidmouth caused to be engraved on this table, was kindly sent me, after Sidmouth's papers had been removed from their use, upright men never met again: they are both in the grave; but their memories will be long cherished in the recollections of a grateful country.

At the beginning of 1842, Lord Hill took a small villa at Fulham, and for a time seemed to derive great pleasure from the change. But his constitution was gone; and though the attention of Dr. Hair to his health, and of Colonel Egerton to his public business and domestic comforts, was all that he could wish, he continued to decline. On the arrival of the King of Prussia he was at Hardwick, and was advised, by Dr. Darwin of Shrewsbury, to absent himself from the festivities at Windsor Castle. One of his greatest comforts was the constant attention of this eminent physician, of whose skill and judgment he had the highest possible opinion. Lord Hill's excuses were most kindly received. Lord Liverpool wrote:—

“Dear Lord Hill,

“Fife House, Jan. 1842.

“I sincerely regret what you mention in your letter; first, of your indisposition, and, secondly, I am sure Prussian Majesty will be anxious to see a distinguished person as yourself. I trust, however, that your health will recover; and I am quite sure that, considering the time of year and severity of the weather, Darwin advised you correctly. Believe me ever,

“My dear Lord,

“Sincerely yours,

“LIVERPOOL.”

Sir James Graham, in a note expressing the regret, observed, “The King of Prussia will know the cause of your absence, and will partake of the general regret which it occasions.”

As soon as Lord Hill himself was able to return to London, affairs of importance engaged him to a degree that was extremely wearing to his body and mind; and in addition he received a shock from the death of his brother, Sir Francis Hill. A letter to Sir Rowland Hill explains all:—

“Belgrave Square, April 7. 1842, ■ ■ ■

“My dear Rowland,

“Since breakfast I have not a moment unoccupied, chiefly with Indian affairs; and although I have [kept] and do keep my mind as quiet as I can from personal and domestic afflictions, I cannot resist sending you a line to condole with you and the family, on the event which will terminate tomorrow by the funeral of poor Francis. I must also beg you to accept my thanks for your note received yesterday, in which you so feelingly and properly conveyed to me its contents. I must also add, that I cordially and truly coincide in your sentiments, and trust that when Almighty God may be pleased to take those who are left, from hence, we shall be prepared to meet Him.

“Probably you will see Sir Robert after you get this. Will you tell him that I have received a very interesting letter from him. One this morning; but it is really a painful and tiresome for me to write, that he is very much my doing at present.

“Hair says I am much better, and I think he is about right.

“Yours ever,

“HILL.”

He still persevered in his daily routine of business, hoping that he was better, notwithstanding his sense of constant exhaustion. He refused almost all invitations, but accepted those from the Duke of Sussex. The Duchess of Gloucester remarked to those near her Royal Highness at table, how well he looked, how unfit he was to be there. He took a house for a month at Colehill, whence he wrote on July 7th, "My pulse better this morning than it had been for some time. My dinner with the Duke of Sussex did me no good. One with the Duke of Cambridge, for Saturday, I must decline. Indeed, they are the only invitations I have accepted for some months." The following day, Colonel Egerton wrote from London:—

"Belgrave Square, July 8, 1811"

"My dear Rowland,

"Lord Fitzroy and I were at Colehill this morning, and had a talk with my Lord, but they did not advance much. Lord Hill said he had not recovered so well as he expected, that his eyesight was very defective, and that he must give up office now or later. But he did not say that I should see the Duke on the subject, nor did he authorize Lord Fitzroy to speak to his Grace upon it.

"I am happy to say he has sent an excuse to the Duke of Cambridge, who has a great military dinner to-morrow.

"My Lord has been at the Horse Guards for three hours to-day, and has seen Hairs, who does not think it necessary to be with me.

"I remain,

"Yours very truly,

"R. EGERTON."

The next account was, "He is extremely feeble; and with a fire in the dining-room, this morning, could scarcely keep himself warm. My Lord went for an hour to Lady Gordon's breakfast yesterday, but did not get up at the Duchess of Buccleuch's to-day."

At the end of July, Lord Hill became so enfeebled, by his cares and exertions, that he determined to request Lord Fitzroy Somerset to the Duke of Wellington he really must give up his office. The Duke called on him, and the propriety of his decision. After mentioning it to the Prime Minister, his Grace immediately wrote to him:—

" My dear Hill,

" London, July 29. 1842.

" Since I saw you this day I have seen Sir Robert Peel, and I have informed him that my visit to you had not altered the impression made upon my mind, by your message yesterday through Lord Fitzroy Somerset. I regret, as I do, and must, that the state of your health render it necessary for you to discontinue your valuable services to her Majesty, the high situation which you have so long filled, not less to the public advantage than to your own honour.

" Sir Robert Peel will immediately take into consideration the arrangements to be made for the performance of the important duties hitherto performed by you, which will be submitted to her Majesty, and carried into execution as soon as may be practicable after the prorogation of Parliament. He will communicate with you before he will bring the subject under her Majesty's consideration, and will settle with you the mode in which her Majesty shall be informed of the loss which the service is about to sustain, and the period at which such information shall be conveyed to her Majesty.

" Believe me, my dear Hill,

" Ever yours most sincerely,

" WELLINGTON."

Lord Hill having left London by the advice of his physician, it was resolved that he should transmit, through Sir Robert Peel, a letter to her Majesty, tendering his resignation:—

" Lord Hill presents his duty to your Majesty, and craves your Majesty's gracious permission to lay before your Majesty his resignation of the command of your Majesty's army.

Lord Hill deeply regrets the necessity of taking a step which will deprive him of a charge that has been so long committed to his hands, and for his continuance in which he is indebted to your Majesty's grace and favour; but he has again suffered much from the illness under which he laboured in the early part of the year, and his health has, in consequence, become so indifferent, as to make him unequal to the adequate discharge of the various important duties of his command; which, therefore, he trusts he could not retain with due regard to the interests of your Majesty's service.

Lord Hill is flattered that he has been able to make application for retirement before your Majesty himself, and personally to have expressed your Majesty's deep and lasting sense of your Majesty's gracious kindness to him on all occasions. Having, however, left London by the advice of his medical attendants, and being too unwell to undertake a second journey, Lord Hill avails himself of this mode of assuring your Majesty of his unabated devotion to your Majesty's person, of the pain and sorrow with which he relinquishes an appointment that afforded him the honour and advantage of executing your Majesty's commands, and of receiving many gracious proofs of your Majesty's support and

“ Windsor Castle, August 12, 1842.”

To this communication her Majesty most graciously condescended to reply; and enhanced this signal mark of her royal favour by causing her autograph letter to be forwarded by Prince Albert:—

“ Windsor Castle, August 12, 1842.”

“ The Queen received Lord Hill's letter of the instant, and is much concerned to learn that Lord Hill is suffering in health that he thinks it his duty to resign the important office which he has so long and so honourably filled.

“ The Queen can only reluctantly give her consent to this determination, as she regrets to lose Lord Hill's services at the head of the army. She cannot, however, omit this opportunity of expressing to Lord Hill her approbation of his conduct throughout the time he served her.

“The Prince begs to have his kind regards to Lord Hill.”

Prince Albert having so kindly transmitted her Majesty's letter to Lord Hill, he sent his answer through the same channel, accompanied by a note of thanks :—

“Hardwick Grange, Shrewsbury, August 14. 1842.”

“Your Royal Highness having done me the honour to send me the expression of your good wishes, and to forward to me the Queen's most gracious letter through which they were conveyed, I hope I may be allowed to send mine to my Sovereign through the same channel, and at the same time to express the feelings of consideration and esteem with which I shall ever remain

“Your Royal Highness's faithful

“And devoted servant,

“HILL.

“His Royal Highness the Prince Albert, K.G., &c.”

Lord Hill thus expressed his feelings to her Majesty :—

“Lord Hill presents his humble duty to your Majesty, and with a full heart returns to your Majesty his unfeigned thanks, for the gracious terms in which your Majesty has been pleased to accept his resignation of the command of your Majesty's army.

“If any thing could reconcile Lord Hill to a sacrifice, a sense of duty in your Majesty's service alone could him to make, it is the gratifying assurance so graciously expressed by your Majesty, of your entire approbation of his conduct throughout the time he has served your Majesty; the recollection of which will be cherished by Lord Hill with the warmest feelings of duty and gratitude to the latest day of his life.”

“Hardwick Grange, Shrewsbury, August 14. 1842.”

Such a testimony from the Queen's _____ as gratifying as it was unexpected. Sir Robert Peel, on receiving Lord _____ letter _____ her Majesty, _____ plied, "I shall probably have _____ interview with her Majesty to-morrow; and I feel very confident that her Majesty will commission me to express in the strongest terms, her _____ of your valuable public services, her high esteem for your character, and her deep regret that the state of your health compels you to retire from an important trust, the duties of which you have discharged with exemplary fidelity." Sir Robert further observed, "I need not _____ you, that those _____ my sentiments; and that I sincerely lament the discontinuance of a connection in public life, which has been to me the _____ of unmixed satisfaction. You will carry with you into _____ honourable retirement the affectionate attachment of the army, and the grateful recollection of your services in the field, and in the command of the army at home, by the people of this country. You have my earnest prayer that your health may be improved by repose from public labours."

The letters which passed between Lord Hill and those distinguished officers who were associated with him at the Horse Guards, _____ full of expressions of unfeigned mutual esteem. To Lord Fitzroy Somerset he wrote, "I felt from the first that I might place the _____ reliance upon your judgment and ability, and that feeling the experience of _____ many years _____ only tended _____ strengthen _____ confirm." _____ expressed himself also in the kindest terms to Sir Willoughby Gordon, and to Sir John Macdonald, the Quarter-Master-General, and Adjutant-General. The former assured him, in reply, that his labours had been made light by his constant encouragement, "combined with the gentlest manner, and the firmest purpose;" and the latter remarked how much relieved he had been by his Lordship's kindness of heart, "in discharging the austere duties of the department of discipline."

On the 15th of August, the following General Order was issued from the Horse Guards:—

General Lord Hill finds it necessary to resign the command of the army on account of his Lordship's present state of health, and her Majesty has been graciously pleased to accept his Lordship's resignation. When Lord Hill assumed the command which he now resigns, he expressed, in General Orders, his confident hope that from general and other officers as well as from the public departments of the army, he would receive that support which should enable him to fulfil the important trust reposed in him. That hope has not been disappointed; but, on the contrary, realized beyond Lord Hill's sanguine expectation. The conduct of the troops has, both in the field and in quarters, furnished, during Lord Hill's command of them, an example of discipline, regularity, and general efficiency not to be surpassed, and the officers have, by their devotion to their duty, enabled his Lordship to maintain the army in that creditable state. The officers have therefore established their claim to Lord Hill's lasting gratitude and affection. His Lordship cannot, then, but with painful feelings take leave of officers, non-commissioned officers, and soldiers, whose conduct has been so uniformly approved by their sovereign, and by their country. These feelings are however, greatly alleviated and consoled by the reflection that the command of the army is now to be resumed by the Duke of Wellington, ever-vigilant and most influential guardian of its interests, and whose achievements have raised its character to the highest pinnacle of glory."

The first thing Lord Hill did when the Duke resumed this command, was to address his Grace in favour of his esteemed aid-de-camp and secretary, Colonel Egerton. In justice to that excellent man and able officer, the letter is given entire :—

“ Grange, Shrewsbury, August 16. 1814.

“ My dear Duke of Wellington,

“ It gives me the highest satisfaction to learn that you have consented to entrust me the command of the army.

“ I am anxious to recommend Colonel Egerton to your kind protection, and I have the less hesitation in bringing him before you, as I believe you are not ignorant of his merit. He has been in the army ever since 1798. He served both in North and South America, and in the campaigns of the Peninsula from 1809 to end of the war; and he was severely wounded at Waterloo. He was Adjutant-General at Albuera, when in charge of the Adjutant-General's department; and having become my aid-de-camp the following year, he has been employed under me to the present hour. During the whole time I held the command of the army he has been my Private Secretary, and has so discharged the duties of that situation that I can speak very highly of him, nor say how much I feel indebted to him.

“ I had intended, when I offered my resignation to the Queen, to solicit her Majesty's permission to recommend him for the grant of a year's pay out of the Good Service Fund; but finding that the sum disposable at this time is considerably less than that, I can only be infinitely obliged to your Grace if you will recommend him for it when you may have an opportunity.

“ Believe me ever,

“ My dear Duke of Wellington,

“ Yours very faithfully,

“ HILL.”

The Duke, who was passing through London to Walmer when he received this letter, desired Lord

Fitzroy Somerset to be so good as to reply to it by return of post, which he did in these terms:—“The Duke of Wellington came to town early this morning from Windsor, and is now gone to Walmer. He told me that the Queen spoke much and most kindly of your Lordship; and he desired me to say, that he had received your letter in favour of Colonel Egerton, and that you may rely upon his recommending him for the first 200*l.* a year he has to dispose of.” Colonel Egerton was not long in receiving this and other tokens of his Grace’s approbation.

Lord Hill had to deal with no less than eleven Secretaries at War during his administration of the army, if we reckon the second appointment of Sir Henry Hardinge; ten without it. They were, Viscount Palmerston, Sir Henry Hardinge, Lord Francis Leveson Gower, Mr. C. Williams Wynn, Sir Henry Parnell, Sir John Cam Hobhouse, Mr. Edward Ellice, Mr. J. C. Herries, Viscount Howick, Mr. T. B. Macaulay, Sir Henry Hardinge. Notwithstanding their difference of views, they all seemed to regard him with personal respect, and treated him with courtesy. The esteem of the last-named distinguished servant of her Majesty was expressed as follows:—

“My dear Lord,

“War Office, August 1855

“I came to town last night, and I take this opportunity of expressing to your Lordship the deep sense of respect I shall always entertain towards your Lordship, for the very cordial assistance and co-operation I received from you in the performance of my official duties.

“I trust, my dear Lord, that your health will continue to improve, and that I shall have frequent opportunities of witnessing its perfect re-establishment. My anxiety is shared most entirely by the officers of the army, who have so long had the happiness to serve under your Lordship's command.

" Will you do me the favour to mention to Egerton that I have this day written a note to Lord Fitzroy Somerset, for the purpose of conveying to him my hearty concurrence in Colonel Egerton's appointment to be a Lieutenant-Colonel unattached.

" I am, my dear Lord, with sentiments of the sincerest respect and esteem,

" Your Lordship's very faithful servant,

" H. HARDINGE.

" The Lord Hill, G.C.B."

Lord Hill's [redacted] proves how much he felt this, and other similar communications, on his retirement:—

" Hardwick Grange, near Shrewsbury, August 23. 1842.

" My dear Hardinge,

" Your very gratifying and friendly letter did not reach me so soon as it ought, having been mis-sent to Chester. I hasten to thank you for it, and to assure you that the satisfaction derived from our official intercourse has at least been mutual, and I am very sensible of the support I have always received at your hands.

The kind feeling shown by so many valued friends, on the occasion of my retirement from the command of the army, has been most gratifying, and I can only regret that the state of my health made such a step necessary. I hope I may not have deferred it too long, and that in the quiet of the country I may still live to see my distinguished successor acquit himself as he always does.

" Thank you much for remembering Egerton. He is not with me at present, but I expect him in a few days. I have been anxious to do what I could for him, and I am sure he [redacted] duly appreciate your kindness to him.

" Ever, my dear Hardinge,

" Yours with great truth,

" HILL.

" Lieutenant-General the Right Hon.
Sir Henry Hardinge, K. C. B."

The General Order of the Duke of Wellington, issued on the 17th of August, when his Grace took possession of the Horse Guards, was very gratifying to Lord Hill. It is brief, but to the point: —

“ In obedience to her Majesty’s command, Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington assumes the command of the army, and earnestly requests the assistance and support of the general and other officers of the army to maintain the discipline, good order, and high character, for which it has been conspicuous, and which have been maintained to a degree so deserving of praise during the long period of the command of his respected predecessor, General Lord Hill. The Duke of Wellington sincerely regrets that the state of his Lordship’s health should have rendered it necessary for him to desire to discontinue his active services; and he anxiously hopes that the army will not suffer in consequence of the change.”

Lord Hill had not long given up the arduous post he so reluctantly quitted, when he received, in a letter from Sir Robert Peel, the announcement of his elevation to the rank of Viscount: —

“ My dear Lord Hill, Whitehall, Aug. 1801.”

“ I have received the commands of the Queen to acquaint you that in consideration of your high character, your eminent military services in the field, and the ability, integrity, and zeal with which you have discharged for many years the important duties of the office of Commander of the Forces, her Majesty proposes to raise you to the rank of Viscount; and in order that there may be a permanent record of your public services, to confer the title with remainder to your nephew, Sir Rowland Hill.

“ It is very gratifying to me personally, who have so long had the satisfaction of being acquainted with you, and have had so many opportunities of judging of your merits as a servant of the Crown, to be the channel of a communication which will, I trust, be acceptable to you. Believe me, my dear Lord, with sincere esteem,

" Most faithfully yours,

" ROBERT PEEL."

The letter acknowledging this communication ■■■■ truly characteristic of the modesty and gratitude of its writer. His chief pleasure in accepting this ■■■■ mark of the royal favour was its extension to his nephew, Sir Rowland Hill, whom he regarded with ■■■■ parent's affection, and whose attentions ■■■■ now cheering his decline.

" Hardwick Grange, Shrewsbury,

" My dear Sir Robert,

August ■■■ 1842.

" I have this morning had the honour of receiving your letter of yesterday, announcing in terms the most gratifying to my feelings, that her Majesty has been graciously pleased to raise me to the rank of a Viscount.

" The gracious and condescending words which her Majesty vouchsafed to address to me with her own hand, on accepting my resignation of the command of the army, had left me without one wish ungratified: but since it is her Majesty's royal will and pleasure still further to declare her approval of my poor services, by conferring on me the title of Viscount, I shall feel much indebted by your assuring her Majesty, with the expression of my humble duty, ■■■■ I most gratefully accept this additional mark of her Majesty's favour, and that I am very sensible of the considerate feeling which has led her Majesty to continue the title to my nephew, Sir Rowland Hill.

" I cannot conclude without requesting you to accept my unfeigned thanks for the very gratifying terms in which you have made this communication, as well as for the kindness and promptitude with which you have enabled me to retire from the fatigues of office, and which I shall ever retain a grateful recollection of.

" Believe me, my dear Sir Robert,

" Yours very faithfully,

" Rt. Hon. Sir Robert Peel, Bart., M.P."

" HILL.

Lord Hill seemed at this time to be somewhat revived by the air of his native county. In the month of September, I went on a visit to Hawkstone, where he was expected. On his arrival, I met him coming towards the garden, and never did I see, in so short a time, a more striking change than was passed over his entire appearance. His gait, his habits, were all different; yet the same bland spirit pervaded his conversation, and gave a charm to his manner. He appeared to enjoy the society at his nephew's hospitable table, but retired to lie down after the departure of the ladies. An artist was at Hawkstone taking photographic views with his apparatus set up in the gallery; and Lord Hill was amused with the process, and with sitting for his own, but was not able to stay long at a time. At dinner, he was often cheerful, and full of anecdote, and sometimes appeared to rally much, that hopes of his restoration to comfortable health were entertained by those who were with him. Occasionally he was a good deal overcome after a morning's writing, rendered necessary by references to him on the part of the army. His memory on these points was most accurate. He knew every man's place, and every man's services. The American Boundary Question interested him a good deal; and he made himself master of the maps, which he explained with a clearness that surprised us all. At times he was so much better, that he superintended several little farming improvements at Hardwick; but exertion generally proved too much for him.

On the Sabbath, it was most pleasing to see the fervour of his devotion, and his anxiety to attend the services of the day. Mr. Hill took great interest in the village church at Hadual, and assisted him liberally to put it into a state of tasteful, but unostentatious, repair. The last day I ever saw him in his own house, he invited myself and others to accompany him to see the alterations he had made in the church. We went; and as we left the interior, he walked pensively round the tower. He was standing on the spot which he felt conscious would soon be his grave. He gave me indistinct answers to my question, and relapsed into silence. The recollection of that day will never pass from my mind. He came back to Hawkstone for a short visit. The morning of his departure I went into his room to bid him adieu. "May God bless you and prosper you," were his last kind words; and I saw that he felt they were his last. I had been the minister whom he had heard for the two previous Sundays; and I could not fail to mark the simplicity of his manner, and the deep feeling which evidently pervaded his mind, though, as usual, he said little, but that little conveyed much to me of his character. I have every reason to believe that, with him, " in evening time it was light," and that he was looking penitently for salvation through Christ alone.

I can never cease to cherish the most grateful remembrance of his kind attention to myself. One instance I cannot refrain from mentioning here. Knowing my father for my revered guardian, the Rev. Rowland Hill, and the loss I sustained by his death, he once marked his veneration for his uncle and his friendly feeling to me, by having engraved on a valuable stone a small head of Mr. Rowland Hill, of exquisite workmanship. This he caused to be set in a handsome ring of antique form, which he sent me with a note expressive of the motives which had induced him to present me with such a token of his regard. On all occasions his first impulse was in the most benevolent direction, and he carried out his intentions with a refinement peculiarly his.

The last letter he wrote to his aid-de-camp, Colonel Egerton, who had sent him a little financial statement to allay some apprehensions he seemed to feel as to his future income, shows his great regard for that invaluable friend, and the quiet character of his home occupations.

"Dear Egerton,      "Hardwick Grange, Sept. 14. 4 P. M.

"I have received your note of yesterday, with the account book. If I had the strength and power of writing 'a sprig of prose,' this would be one opportunity of doing so, to press, in the strongest manner I am able, my obligations to you for your kind and laborious management of my private concerns. Indeed, without your long-continued attention and trouble, my affairs would have been in a bad state, and I should have been a poor man. I do not wish to confine my obligations to you to the charge of my privy purse, but to [extend] them also to every branch, public and private, in which I have experienced the kind and friendly assistance which for many years I have had from you.

"We are just returned from Acton Reginald."

The pond is just finished: it has occupied twelve or thirteen men every day, and is considered to be an excellent job. The quantity of mud has satisfied Beeston. There were many hundred little carp and one pike in the pit. It is time for the post, so I must send this hasty letter off.

"Yours ever most truly,

"HILL."

* The seat of Sir Andrew Corbet, niece, of the present Bert., Hill's Vicar at Hill.

This letter, probably his last, was written in a tremulous hand; and though he felt tolerably comfortable, it was too plain to his friends that he was rapidly sinking. They had, however, the happiness of seeing him in that state of mind which manifested serious preparation for his end. On his first arrival in Shropshire, after his resignation, he expressed great satisfaction at having escaped from London, particularly on account of the enjoyment he experienced in spending his Sundays in the country. The heat and crowd of the churches in town had so completely overcome him, that he was obliged frequently to stay at home; but he was able constantly to attend divine service in a quiet country village, and at the chapel belonging to the house at Hawkstone. He seemed to have entirely thrown off all worldly cares, and to have fixed his thoughts on the mighty interests of the world to which he was rapidly hastening. He said little, but his solemnity during public worship, and at the prayers of the family, was perceptible to every one present. When he became too weak to leave his house, his nephew, the Rev. John Hill, went on Sunday evenings to Hardwick, and read the prayers and a sermon to him in private. If Mr. John Hill happened to be prevented going, another nephew, the Rev. Francis Hill, occupied his place. Whenever Mr. John Hill called, the conversation was always such as became the chamber of a dying man; and he was invariably asked to pray with his uncle. "As observed," says his eldest sister, in a communication on the subject, "the deep feeling expressed by the invalid when the glorious plan of redemption was dwelt upon through the atonement of our Lord Jesus Christ; and [ ] who [ ] his death-bed, had [ ] comfort of believing that the name of [ ] Saviour was a cordial to him in [ ] distressing state of weakness." His affections [ ] evidently concentrated upon Him who is the sinner's only hope, the sinner's only friend. He felt the [ ] force of the truth, that "no other foundation [ ] man lay, than [ ] is laid, which [ ] Jesus Christ;" and that no man, of [ ] grade, [ ] to the Father but by Him. This is a lesson the mightiest of the earth must learn before they can depart in peace. When on the eve of his [ ] journey to Taganrog, where he died, the Emperor Alexander of Russia said to a benevolent English gentleman*, whom he had for years honoured [ ] his confidence, "Do you think that any man, however exalted in station, or distinguished for philanthropy, can be safe in resting on any other ground for salvation, but a humble reliance on the perfect, all-sufficient atonement of his crucified Redeemer?" "Certainly not, sire," was the unhesitating reply. "That [ ] my opinion," said the Emperor, "[ ] I try daily to realize it: I have no other hope; it is [ ] only comfort." The same [ ] was deeply [ ] by Lord Hill; and he [ ] supported by [ ] to the last. Sir [ ] Hill, who [ ] constantly [ ] his bed-side, was much impressed by the manifest penitence [ ] his beloved uncle. At length Lord Hill became [ ] ingly overcome with torpor, and slept the greater part of his time, but seldom woke without desiring his nephew to come and pray with him, and read him portions of the Scriptures. On one occasion, he selected himself the fifty-first Psalm, particularly suited to the nature of his feelings; and a more satisfactory evidence could scarcely have been given of his spirit, with its essential accompaniment, his desire for a new heart. He said to Mr. John Hill, "I have a great deal to be thankful for; I believe, also, I have an enemy in the world. With regard to my religious feelings, I have more power to express much, and never had: but I do not feel sincere; and I hope for mercy." When the sacrament was administered to him, there were present, Sir Rowland Hill, Colonel Egerton, and his two affectionate sisters, Miss Hill, and Miss Emma Hill. "Ah!" said he to Colonel Egerton, who arrived that day, "I thought you would come and join me in this." His valet, Calderwood, told Mr. John Hill, "His Lordship never a day or night but he prays earnestly." On the day of his death, though at times it could hardly be ascertained whether he was still conscious, and had ceased to reply to any ordinary question, when Mr. John Hill said, "Shall I pray with you?" he immediately raised his head, and clasped his hands. Shortly after, he gave a faint sigh, and died more.

* [ ] Yornig, Esq., well [ ] he was supported by the late and known in St. [ ] for his [ ] present expenses. many acts of benevolence, in which

Lord Hill died on Saturday morning, December 10., on which very day the following kind letter was written from Windsor:—

" Sir,

" Windsor Castle, December 10. 1842.

" Her Majesty and the Prince have heard with very great concern of the serious illness of Lord Hill, and have commanded me to write, to make particular inquiries in their name as to how Lord Hill is. I shall be much obliged to you to let me know, and to inform Lord Hill of the gracious message which has been sent.

" I have the honour to be, Sir,

" Your most obedient servant,

" G. G. A. "

" Lord Hill, Bart., M.P."

Sir [redacted] could only reply, " It is my painful duty to acquaint you, for the information of the Queen and his Royal Highness, that my uncle's long illness terminated in his death on Saturday morning last, [redacted] 10th [redacted]. Although Lord Hill's valuable life was not spared long enough for him to learn the feeling of interest which her Majesty and the Prince had so graciously expressed towards him, yet I beg to be permitted to state, with my humble duty to the Queen and his Royal Highness, that their gracious condescension [redacted] duly appreciated, [redacted] will be [redacted] gratefully remembered by the surviving members [redacted] family." Her Royal Highness [redacted] Duchess of Kent, in commanding the expression of [redacted] sympathy, was pleased to designate him " her old and esteemed friend ;" [redacted] from the [redacted] distinguished quarters his relatives received such expressions of regard for the departed, as tended [redacted] afford them great consolation under their bereavement. [redacted] Duke of Wellington wrote thus : —

" Strasburgh, Dec. 12. 1842.

" My dear Sir Rowland,

" Your letter of the 10th, giving me the melancholy account of the death on that morning of your uncle, my old companion and friend, Lord Hill, reached me yesterday.

" You may conceive better than I can express how much I have felt his loss. More than thirty-five years have elapsed since I had the satisfaction of being first connected with and assisted by him in the public service; and I must say that, from that moment up to the latest period of his valuable and honourable life, nothing ever occurred to interrupt for one moment the friendly and intimate relations which subsisted between us.

" During many years, when both were employed in the service of our Sovereign, he invariably did every thing in his power to promote my views. The habits then established continued up to the latest period of his holding the Command in Chief of the army. He knew that he could rely upon my support and assistance upon every occasion of difficulty or annoyance to him. I performed no more than my duty in affording both; but I have the satisfaction of feeling that he knew that it was performed willingly and heartily.

" I beg you to be assured, and to convey to your family the assurance of my condolence in the severe loss which they have sustained; and that you will believe me to be

" Ever yours most sincerely,

" WELLINGTON.

" Sir Rowland Hill, Bart.,
" Hardwick Grange, Shrewsbury."

This letter was one of the chief secondary comforts of his surviving friends. I call them secondary, [REDACTED] their grand primary [REDACTED] the assurance that the man whose praise was on the lips of all classes — of his Sovereign, his chieftain in arms, his companions in public service, even those whose opinions did not harmonize with his own, his dependents, and the recipients of his charities—himself departed this life in deep tranquillity before his God, and casting all his hopes of immortality on the atoning love of his Redeemer. To Him, and Him only, he looked believingly at the moment when the vain glitter of this tinsel world faded from his view. His anxious prayer was that God would pardon his frailties and infirmities, renew a right spirit within him, and show him mercy.

It was Lord Hill's particular desire that his funeral should be private. The Corporation of Shrewsbury offered to attend; but his family declined this and all other tokens of respect, in accordance with his own press instructions. He was interred in the little village church of Hadnal, on Friday, December the 16th. One incident was simple and touching. A recruiting party of the 53d Regiment, which the deceased had once commanded, came of their own accord, formed a line, and saluted the body as it passed to the tomb. There were, besides, multitudes of spectators, whose presence was deep and solemn. In Shrewsbury, and the surrounding towns, peals of bells, and a universal suspension of business, gave touching evidence of no common respect for "the soldier's friend," and the distinguished ornament of his county.

While engaged in preparing for this last and solemn duty, the mourners were destined to receive a shock nearly overwhelmed them. On that very morning, Mrs. Hill, the widow of Lord Hill's esteemed eldest brother, and the mother of the present Viscount, died at the Citadel, in Hawkstone Park. She had been ill for some time, and during her illness manifested all these proofs of the influence of genuine religion which adorn the doctrine of the Gospel, and exhibit its supporting and consoling power. The last time she ever left her house was to pay a visit at Hardwick, but the interview with her dying brother-in-law was permitted. Neither Lord Hill nor herself were fit for such a meeting. On returning home, she observed, "God only knows, but most probably we shall never be under the same roof again in this world." Lady Hill was afterwards to stay with her. When she heard of Lord Hill's anxious wish to receive an interment with Sir Rowland, she said, "Poor man, he clings to Rowland, who has been like a son to him; and he ought to do every thing he can to promote his happiness in his last moments. But I pity poor Rowland; a death-bed scene is a new thing for him; but it is good for him; these things teach a useful lesson, and show us what death really is." When the account of Lord Hill's death actually reached her, it was a stunning blow. She thought and spoke of her husband — but spoke like a Christian. She had Lady Hill's children brought into her room, and made the solemn moment useful to their young minds. All her words were expressive of penitence, and hope in Christ Jesus. She had seemed about to revive: but just as the church bell of the adjacent village of Weston, began to toll in the morning of Lord Hill's interment, about eight o'clock, she died, without the slightest indication of pain. The way in which her eldest son bore the trials of that day, made a lasting impression on the witnesses of his agony of mind, and his struggle to go through the duty before him. The words of an eminent writer "are descriptive of the case of [redacted] deceased mother. — "Her prudence in the managing her children was so singular and rare, that whenever you mean to bless this family, and pray a hearty and profitable prayer for it, beg of God that the children may have those excellent things which she designed to them, and provided for them in heart and wishes, that they may live by her purposes, and may grow thither, whither she would fain have brought them."

Sir Robert Chambre Hill is the only one of Lord Hill's gallant brothers now living: five sisters still survive him. Major General Clement Hill died recently on the western coast of India, deeply lamented. He was in the sixty-third year of his age, and had won the same esteem in his Indian command [redacted] he gained wherever he was situated. "I can never," says an officer [redacted] his staff, "again know so kind, so indulgent a friend;" and he also remarks, "by all the Mysore division, by all that knew him in this country, he was looked up to with the greatest regard and respect.† When he died, there was not a dry eye in the camp; Christians, Mussulmans, and Hindoos mingled their tears, for all loved him." He was buried at Honore, and a detachment of the 28th Native Infantry fired over his grave. The evening [redacted] his death he joined with deep solemnity in the prayers of the Church, which were read to him by the amiable young officer just alluded " Jersey Taylor, of the Com-tore of Carbury.

† It appears from an Indian [redacted] is proposed to erect a tablet to his memory in St.

Mark's church, Bangalore, and to found a charitable institution which shall bear his name.

to. It was the Sabbath; and on Monday morning, January the 20th, he expired ~~after~~ a struggle — merely ~~to~~ breathe.

Sir Robert Hill occupies the house at Prees in which Lord Hill was born, and is one of the ~~most~~ magistrates in the county of Salop. At Hawkstone, the present Viscount and his excellent Viscountess are, in all respects, a blessing to those ~~whom~~ whom their wide influence extends: ~~and~~ are they mentioned, by the gentry, the farmers, and the cottagers, without ~~any~~ note of that affectionate esteem that has from time immemorial rested on the name of Hill.

The personal appearance of Lord Hill at the latter period of his life, is admirably represented in the portrait by Richmond, engraved for this volume. It is a happy likeness of him as he ~~is~~ seen in those circles where he was best known, during the time he ~~was~~ Commander-in-Chief; and it is also ~~in~~ in unison with the simplicity of his character and taste, than ~~he~~ he ~~has~~ been taken covered with the honours* conferred on him for his deeds of arms. In stature, he was, as nearly ~~as~~ possible, what may be called the middle height, with ~~an~~ inclination to stoutness. His complexion ~~was~~ florid; his eye bright; and full of benevolence. ~~His~~ whole demeanour indicated kindness and modesty, rendering him extremely approachable, but mingled with a dignified firmness, which suppressed

* These were, ~~the~~ Cross of ~~the~~ the Bath; Guelphic Order; Tower ~~and~~ Netherlands; ~~the~~ and Sword; the Russian Order of ~~the~~ (Jeop commemorating Battles; St. George; ~~the~~ Turkish Order of the Crescent; Maria Theresa; Military Order of Waterloo Medal.

once any indiscreet attempt to take advantage of his gentle bearing. [REDACTED] command insured obedience without exciting the slightest sense of austerity; and the words of the Latin poet were once appropriately applied to him, [REDACTED] illustrative of his manner [REDACTED] the field, —

“ Monstrat [REDACTED] laboris, Non jubet.”

It was impossible to have any intercourse with him, and [REDACTED] to come away with a glow of kindly feeling. When he laid [REDACTED] his death-bed, [REDACTED] believed [REDACTED] had not [REDACTED] enemy, he spoke that which [REDACTED] the fact. How he won and retained the esteem of the great, the brave, and the good, has sufficiently appeared in this humble attempt to exhibit his real character during the successive stages of his long and memorable [REDACTED]. The most important lesson of his life is in its close, when he [REDACTED] and proclaimed the utter nothingness of all the honours of the world, in comparison with that penitent hope which can alone support the mind [REDACTED] the things of this earthly scene [REDACTED] leaving us. All the trophies of war, however nobly gained, [REDACTED] at [REDACTED] but proofs of the [REDACTED] and passions of [REDACTED]; and though the character of Lord Hill as a soldier must be regarded as a high example, while the profession of arms remains needful, yet we anticipate the period when the triumph of the gospel [REDACTED] be complete, and [REDACTED] nations learn [REDACTED] no more. The great hero of the age, whom Lord [REDACTED] [REDACTED] the inundation of [REDACTED] lawless power which swept away [REDACTED] liberties of other nations of Europe.

and threatened [ ] of our own, has been for nearly thirty years the [ ] promoter of peace. The tendencies of Lord [ ] were [ ] in the same direction. War was [ ] his element; but he [ ] gaged in it, convinced that religion, freedom, the rights of nations, and all that man holds dear, summoned our [ ] into the field. He felt as deeply as any human being all that is afflicting in warfare; but [ ] the [ ] when duty called, these emotions vanished from his mind, and [ ] replaced by a firm and successful resolve to enter into the struggle, in the hope [ ] the [ ] might [ ] the deliverance of Europe and the pacification of the world. When the gracious providence of God brought the contests in which he [ ] so honourably conspicuous to a close, no man expressed a warmer or a more sincere gratitude, and the whole [ ] of his [ ] proved that he had been familiarized to the sight of contest and slaughter without the least detriment to the gentler qualities of his nature. Yet, though conscious of [ ] this, and more — of endeavours [ ] relieve the miseries of war — of kindness to friends — of tenderness to captive enemies — of charity [ ] the poor — of attention to the external offices of religion — of integrity in his public and private acts — [ ] renounced every other foundation, as all [ ] [ ] be saved [ ] do, but the [ ] that [ ] even Jesus Christ.

THE [ ]

WORKS LATELY PUBLISHED.

LETTERS and DESPATCHES of the DUKE of MARLBOROUGH, from 1705 to 1712, recently discovered at Woburn. Edited by General the Right Hon. the General Murray, G.C.B. with Portrait, 3 vols. 8vo.

II.

LIFE of LORD CHANCELLOR KILDON; including his Correspondence and Anecdote Book. By HONOUR THOMAS, Esq., son of Her Majesty's Counsel. With Portraits. Second Edition. 3 vols. 8vo., 42s.

III.

MEMOIRS of SIR HUDSON LOWE; with his Correspondence, chiefly relating to the DETENTION of NAPOLEON at ST. HELENA. Edited by his Son. 2 vols. 8vo. In the Press.

IV.

NAVAL WORTHIES of QUEEN ELIZABETH'S REIGN. Their Achievements, Adventures, and Discoveries; with Biographical Notices. By JOHN BARROW, Esq. 8vo.

V.

THE HONOURABLE RICHARD HILL'S DIPLOMATIC CORRESPONDENCE while Envoy to the Court of Savoy, in the Reign of Queen ANNE. By Rev W BLACKIST, B.A. 3 vols. 8vo., 86s.

VI.

MEMOIR of WILLIAM TAYLOR of NORWICH, including his Correspondence with Southey. By J. W. ROSSIGNOL, Esq. Portrait. 1 vol. 8vo., 66s.

VII.

LIFE of DR ANDREW BELL, Author of the System of Mutual Tuition. By ROBERT SCOTCHER, LL.D., and Rev. C. C. SCOTCHER. 1 vol. 8vo., 42s.

VIII.

LIFE of SIR DAVID WILKIE; with his Letters, Journals, and Critical Remarks on Works of Art, during his Tours. By ALLAN CUMMINGHAM, Esq. Portrait. 3 vols. 8vo., 42s.

IX.

LIFE of SIR SAMUEL ROMILLY, written by Himself; with his LETTERS and POLITICAL DIARY, edited by his Son. Third Edition. Portrait. 3 vols. 8vo. 12s.

X.

MEMOIRS of LORD SYDENHAM; with his Administration in Canada, and his Correspondence. By G. FUGLETT BRIDGE, Esq., M.P. Second Edition, abridged. Portrait. 8vo., 3s. 6d.

XI.

LIFE of BELISARIUS. By Lord MANSFELD, M.P. With a Map. 8vo., 12s.

XII.

LIFE of EDWARD GIBBON; with Selections from his Correspondence, &c., and Notes. By Rev H. H. MILNER. Portrait. 8vo., 3s.

JOHN MURRAY, ALBEMARLE STREET.

